SMOKE DETECTOR EXHIBITED

One of the features of the International Heating and Ventilating Exposition which opened recently in Philadelphia is a smoke detector that may be used for fire prevention.

The smoke detector on display lis a laboratory model, and illustrates the application of the photo-electric tube which is now \8 being made experimentally in the Hudson tube, connecting New York and New Jersey. In 8 the tube, the smoke detector or visability meter as it is there called, is placed in the exhaust duct. If the exhausting smoke becomes dense and photo-electric tube gives warning and attendants put additional exhaust fans to work.

The device shown in Philadelphia consists of a long glass tube. In one end is a light source and in the other a photo-electric or light sensative tube. A small opening in the glass tube permits the operator to blow smoke inside the chamber. When the light intensity is dulled by smoke the photo-electric tube responds throwing a relay which starts an exhaust fan. The fans continue in operation until the atmosphere within the chamber is cleared. The same device may be utilized for fire detection, in which case the relay operates a buzzer or bell instead of the fan.
