My Lord Duke,

Having, by the appointment of your illuftrious parents, had the honour to tend your Grace, the late Duke of Hamilton, and Lady Elifabeth, in the various difeafes and diforders incident to infancy and childhood; and the happinefs, by the divine bleffing on a fafe practice, and an inceffant care to carry you through them, and preferve fuch precious lives, I, in refpect of those perils, and their ever uncertain events, now feel much pleafure and fatisfaction, where I formerly

INTRODUCTION.

INTRODUCTION

THE public must decide concerning the merit of the following travels: meanwhile their author, meaning well, and ambitious to please, if he should not improve his readers, hath strictly adhered to truth, and advanced nothing false.

Impartial in his narrative, he endeavours to render it agreeable and entertaining by giving a juft and plain defcription of every diffinguifhed place through which he paffed, or where he refided; and fairly lays before the reader a general account of its laws and police, its religion, its manners and cuftoms, with whatever is curious, uncommon, or remarkable concerning it,

Afraid of being deemed tedious, he omits the mention of many obvious things: nor does he, as is but too often the cafe with travellers, affect the new, but always aims at the true, defpifing the ftilts of ftory, and regarding the ftandard of things, fo that all his accounts of them are authentic, and none of them counterfeit.

Long abfent from his native country, and, by his bufinefs, obliged to learn the language of others, he hath had little or no leifure to cultivate that of his own; hence the gentle reader will, he humbly hopes, generoufly forgive fome few deviations from purity, proprie-

Plainnefs and fimplicity, and not pomp and elegance, have been his aim; and if he hath fucceeded in this refpect, he fought no more.

from Blackwall with the tide to Gravefind, in

The Author's departure, and what happened immediately before he left England,

N the first of May 1735, I was taken ill in Chelfea with a malignant fever, from which, by the great care of Dr Sharp, I was recovered; but it was fucceeded by a flow remittent one, which daily feemed to increase, notwithstanding that worthy gentleman let me want for nothing which a skilful physician. could administer; whereon he, having confulted the late Dr Mead concerning my cafe, was advised by him to fend me down to Scotland to the place of my birth, not doubting but my native air, with the aid of proper medicines, would carry off the fever, and accomplifh my recovery.

I carefully followed this advice, and lived. about eight months in Scotland : but could fcarcely obferve any change for the better. Early in the year 1736, I refolved to go for Ruffia, hoping that the voyage, and change of air, air, would do me fome fervice, or at leaft that I could but die; and that was then a matter of no confequence to me, whether it fhould happen abroad, or at home.

Accordingly, in June I took fhipping for London, and on the fifth day of July fell down from Blackwall with the tide to Gravefend, in a fhip commanded by Mr Thomas Belchier.

We arrived at Elfineur on the 1 oth, and at Cronftadt on the 29th of July. This paffage was thought by many to be one of the quickeft ever made from London.

But here the reader will halt a little, till I fhall have told him of two trivial accidents which happened to me before I left this happy land of liberty and good fenfe.

The thip having fallen down from London to Blackwall, we dropped anchor for the night; and the mafter went to London. My brother, the mate, two countrymen and I went on fhore to fpend the evening : We ftaid about two hours, and were going to bid farewell to our countrymen, when the mate told me, if I had any gold to change it, and pay our score; for, faid he, what I afterwards found to be falle, " British filver is of greater " value than our gold in Ruffia." I then bid the maid, (as our hoft and his wife were gone to the country on a vifit) get me change for a The maid foon came back with the guinea. guinea, and faid fhe could get no filver for it; when, as I was just going to pay our reckoning, a waterman entered the room, and told us that he would go and get it exchanged for filver. Upon enquiring, and the maid affuring us that he was honeft, and well known to the whole family, I accordingly gave him the guinea, but never faw him more.

Determined however to have juffice done me next morning, we staid in the house till nearly eleven o'clock at night, when we were of a fudden furprifed with a female fcream, which feemed to indicate great diffrefs. Ever ready to contribute what help I could to the afflicted. I ran to the room to the relief of the fair one, who, in an angry tone, told me, " that her house was of good repute, that no-" thing of that kind had ever happened be-" fore that time, that the was mistrefs of the " house, and that the man in the room with " her was her hufhand, and that they hop-" ed to get us punished for defaming her "houfe." My anfwer was, "Well, well, " good woman, I have been cozened out of a " guinea, and doubt not of getting fatisfac-" tion ;" and fo returned to my company.

Soon after this affair, a real or pretended watchman entered our room with his long pole, and ordered us to bed. We defired him to be gone, as we were honeft people, and making no manner of difturbance. Our mild anfwer made the fellow more bold, upon which we turned him out, and remained quiet, till we were alarmed with the cry of the fhip's fhip's crew holfting up the anchor, which obliged us to part with our honeft hoftefs, and me to put up with the foolifh lofs of my guinea.

In our paffage to Ruffia, I told our captain the whole tranfaction. He defired the narration under my hand; this I readily gave him, atteited by my brother, and the mate. In the year 1741, I was informed by Captain Belchier, whom I met at that time in St Peterfburgh, that his crew at their return to London went to that houfe, got drunk upon the credit of the guinea, and at laft prefented to the people of the houfe my attefted declaration, as payment of their reckoning. The landlord and his family threatened, the failors ran mad, and broke every thing, not leaving a fingle glafs window, nor any thing they could break, and fo with great fatisfaction retreated to London.

Of Elfineur and Cronstadt.

A T Elfineur I went afhore, till the fhipmafter difpatched fome bufinefs, which was finished in lefs than two hours; I can therefore fay little about the people, only that they seemed to be very poor, but happy under the government of their king. They were extremely affable to us. I made only one general neral remark concerning that town, as I was in no other, namely, that their native animals were very finall, except themfelves and their maftiff dogs.

At Cronftadt the fhipmafter told me that I fhould pay my compliments, without lofs of time, to the commander Admiral Gordon, elfe it would be very ill taken : Accordingly I went with him to a large palace, where the Admiral lived. As I entered the door, a man, ftanding with proper inftruments, ftopped me, and pointed to my fhoes, which were covered with duft. He immediately cleaned them with as great art as if he had been taught in London. I offered him money, but a gentleman, who was walking in the lobby, forbade me, and, in good English, asked me if I imagined their Admiral was not able to pay his fervants for doing their duty. I excufed myfelf to him, and obferved, that as I imagined he was a Briton, he knew it was the cuftom in that country to give vails to gentlemens fervants. He finiled, and told me that it was no cuftom in Ruffia, and that their mafters took it as a very great affront ; not only fo, but that it made them ufelefs; as they mif-fpent their money, and neglected their duty. I could not deny the juffice of his remark, and he immediately in the most obliging manner fhewed me the room where the Admiral was. The Admiral afked me a great many pertinent queftions, and, in fhort, received me minhit. with with that graceful cafe which is natural to great minds. Amongst other things he afked me. Whether I had any acquaintances in Ruffia? and, Whether I was recommended to any perfons who could be of fervice to me? My anfwer was, That I knew not a fingle perfon, nor did I afk for recommendations to any. He faid that a knowledge of bufinefs was the best recommendation in that country, but at the fame time an introduction to the principal overfeers, made every thing more eafy, and told me, that although Ruffia was but in its infancy in most branches of arts and learning, yet I would experience as fmart an examination as in any country; but doubted not that I fhould meet with juffice. He then fpoke to a gentleman who was in company with him, in the German language, and, after that, defired me to wait upon that gentleman tomorrow, who would give me a letter to the Archiator, who was Prefident of the Medicine Chancery, or College of Medicine, and that probably the Archiator would order me to be examined in a very few days; and, if I was found qualified, he made no doubt of my being put in bufinefs without lofs of time. Next morning I got the letter from the gentleman, who was phyfician to the fleet at Cronftadt.

My fhort ftay in Cronftadt, and my ignorance of fortification will not permit my givmg an exact or fatisfactory account of the place: Suffice it however to fay, that it is, confidering fidering its infancy, a port of no finall strength, great fafety to fhipping, and good policy. The port is a femicircle on the fouth fide of the illand, built from the bottom of the fea with ftones, and topped above with a ftrong ftage of timber, which fupports a great number of the largest cannon. From the middle of the femicircle, exactly opposite the port or entry, is built a large tongue, fo far into the harbour, as to leave only room for thips of the largeft fize to be warped in. The royal navy ly moored on the eaft fide, and fhipping from all trading countries ly on the weft fide of the tongue. Directly oppofite the port of this fine harbour, at a little diftance, is a fmall rock well fortified, and furnished with large cannon, called Crownflott. No perfons are allowed to have fire or candle aboard any fhip in the harbour : A candle is allowed in great need; but the candleftick muft be placed in a veffel with water. All gun-powder is taken from the fhips before they enter the harbour, and fecurely put into the imperial magazines till the fhips are warped out, and ready to fail. Cook-rooms are built at a diftance from the fhips next the city, in the harbour, fo that the water furrounds them on all fides, where the feafaring people are allowed to drefs their meat. Fronting this harbour is a range of fine palaces, built of brick, for the great fea-officers, and their different courts. Behind these buildings is the city, confifting of many wooden houfes, and

and one of the finest dry docks possibly in the world ; behind all which to the north is a large line and ditch, reaching from eaft to weft, on the rampart of which are many baffions with cannon. The whole ifland is naturally fortified on the eaft, north, and weft, with fhallow water and many rocks and ftones; and the city is alfo well fortified by art. The royal navy here confifts of about thirty fhips of war; one of them, the Royal Ann, mounts 120 guns. The fortifications are defended by marines and failors. When any fhip is to be let into the port, a foldier is placed on board, to take care of finuggling, and that the orders of police be ftrictly complied with. Their authority, if they behave well, is not finall. Every morning and evening a large boat, with an officer, full of foldiers, is rowed round the fhipping, and at every fhip the officer enquires, If all is well?

Two accidents happened whilft I was there, of which I muft acquaint the reader. I bought an anchor of brandy at Elfineur: Before we dropped anchor at Cronftadt, I was informed that the cuftom-houfe officers would carefully vifit every cheft, and that my brandy would ftand a bad chance, though it was in bottles. The mate defired me to leave my key with him, whilft I went with the Captain to wait on the Admiral. At my return I was informed, that fo foon as eight or ten of these cuftomhouse people faw the flass, they feated themfelves being

felves round with a view to drink, faying, Boch dal, that is, "God hath fent," a very common expression among the Russians, when they accidentally meet with any good luck. The mate, who was present, told them that those bottles belonged to a doctor; that there was poison in some of them, but as the doctor was gone ashore, it was impossible for him to fay which was good, or dangerous. Upon this they rose condoling their misfortunes.

The other is; A paffenger, who had a few watches to difpose of, and a dozen of new hats. The failors, who had given him a good leffon, fmuggled the watches eafily, but the hats coft more trouble, as each failor could take only one at a time on his head. At laft it was obferved by one of the cuftomhouse foldiers in. a fhip which lay along fide of ours, that the failors went ashore with new hats, but returned either with old ones, or none. This happened just as the whole cargo had been fafely landed over night. Next day, in the afternoon, as the paffenger was going afhore, the difcovery was then made public; whereupon the foldier feized him, and wanted to take the watch from his pocket; for which, in place of delivering it, he gave the foldier a box on the ear; but the people on board inftantly feparated them, fo that none of them were hurt. The foldier fwore revenge, and the mate, a very ingenuous good lad, told me, that our young paffenger was in no finall danger of.

being feverely profecuted; becaufe, he faid, which I afterwards found to be very true, that the greatest general durft not strike a foldier when upon duty; that ignorance of the language was the beft, and indeed a good plea: " But," fays he, " if you'll take my advice, " I hope to bring him off, at the going round " of the evening boat." Accordingly the mate and I caufed prepare a quart mug of punch, but fo flrong, that it was at leaft half fpirits, with a large proportion of fugar; this, after having feigned to drink to each other, we left on the capitain, and went into the cabbin, pretending business. The foldier wanted to tafte the liquor; he did fo, found it palatable, tafted it again and again, and thus continued tipling till he had emptied the mug, foolifhly believing it fair drink, and that we had forgot This was just what the mate expected; it. for when the round returned, our foldier was fast asleep, and fo dead drunk, that, when roufed, he could not articulate one fenfible word. The mate told the officer, that he could not take upon him to anfwer for what might be done in the fhip, as the foldier was a thief, and was drunk, fleeping on the deck, with liquor he had stolen whilst we were engaged in bufinefs below; that he believed he was drunk in the morning, having without the leaft reafon abufed one of the paffengers, and wanted to rob him of his watch. The officer coming aboard, and finding the man quite quite ftupid, changed him immediately for another; and forry was I next morning to fee him feverely whipped with rods. The foldier on board the other fhip, I was told, was afraid to complain to his officer, as he had not done his duty, when he at firft made the obfervation; for which neglect he would have been feverely punifhed. But the other, that was punifhed, fuffered for two crimes in one action; the firft was, in taking what was not his own, and the next, in getting drunk, effecially when upon his duty.

The author fets out from Cronstadt, and arrives in St Petersburg.

HAVING staid in Cronstadt three days, I went in a long boat to St Petersburg, which is about 20 miles distant from Cronstadt. We failed up the end of the gulf of Finland, which, to the east of Cronstadt, may be about nine or ten miles broad: The country on both fides is a rising country, covered over, as we thought, with losty trees, mostly firs, which forms an agreeable prospect from the water; but there is much cleared ground, tho' in our fituation we could see but little of it. The wind blowing high, and easterly, accompanied with such thunder and rain as I never faw faw before, and the ftorm encreafing to fuch a degree, that we were happy in getting our boat under the cover of trees, and moored on the weft fide of Vafilie ifland; where, all wet, we covered ourfelves with the fails, and lay till the morning, near a haven called the Galley port, or Galerna haven.

On Sunday morning we failed up the north branch of the Neva, having Vafilie Oftroff or ifland to the fouth, and the caftle to the north fide, both fhores well covered with barks, and fhips of a finaller fize: We at laft arrived in the city, and lodged at the only British public house in it, kept by one Frazer a Scotsman.

CHAP. IV.

Concerning St Petersburgh.

H ERE I do not propofe to defcribe this city, but only to take notice of the more remarkable places, of the royal palaces, different courts, curiofities, cuftoms, and policy of the city; which, by the bye, is a pattern to all the reft of the cities in Ruffia. Tho' there are feveral different palaces in the city, I fhall only mention three. The moft ancient and moft refpected, is a finall houfe, which was built by the founder of the city, and father of the grandeur of the Ruffian empire, Peter the Great. It is built of wood, confifting of a finall kitchen, a room to do bufinefs in and dine, and a finall bed-chamber, little bigger than a large bed-ftead. It has a gallery round it covered, where that great emperor ufed to walk in rainy weather, or when the heat of the fun was intolerable.

The first boat built in Petersburgh by him, is placed at the end of this palace; and both house and boat are covered over with a shade of timber, to preferve them from the injuries of the air. It flands on the north fide of the river Neva, near the citadel. The next palace stands on the fouth fide, is also built of wood, and is called the fummer palace. This was also faid to be built by the great Peter; but it differs much from the former, being a very great building, containing a good many fpacious rich rooms, well fupplied with the richeft furniture, having the Neva on the north, and very fpacious gardens to the fouth, in which are feveral pleafure-houfes, pavilions, fhell-works, water-works, fine flatues, and a private play-houfe, with a beautiful lake, well ftored with fifh, which will fwim to you upon tolling a bell on a ftage, whence they get the grofs of their food.

Before this palace there is a very finall fhip mounting fix finall cannon, faid to have been built by a Ruffian peafant, and prefented to the great Peter, who called it Dadufhka or grandfather, and obliged every fhip, which was built built at St Petersburgh, to pay their respects to it.

About half a mile down the fouth fide of the Neva, flands a noble pile of flone, a very large fquare, containing a great number of fpacious rooms : This is called the winter palace. It is probably one of the fineft buildings in Europe; but the infide far outdoes the outfide. Surely no palace has nobler furniture, made of the finest materials, and remarkable for the most exquisite workmanthip. In this fquare are lodged, not only the royal family, its retinue and attendants, but alfo the guards on duty, which are faid to be 500, and are changed every morning. About a quarter of a mile fouth from the Neva. is another beautiful wooden palace built upon a canal. I never was within it, but was told that it furpafied all the reft in gilding, rich finishing and furniture, as it was built by the late empress Elizabeth; and it is probably very true, as fhe loved grandeur, and in her conceits never confidered expence. There are two others of lefs note.

The fupreme court, which abfolutely rules the whole Ruffian empire, and all other inferior courts, is called the cabinet. In it the monarch prefides; and, with the advice of two or three principal officers of ftate, decides all fecret, perplexed, troublefome, and weighty affairs; nor do they give notice of any of their transactions to any other court, except they

in

they judge it neceffary ; and this is always done by way of a royal command, against which there is no addretfing, but by way of petition in the humbleft manner, never find ing nor even infinuating the finalleft fault, but respectfully representing the real state of the cafe, and most humbly entreating re-confideration of the affair ; but this is never done till the monarch is verbally and cautioully informed of the matter, and the great ministers of state are gained over to affift heartily in a repeal; for, should they act in a lefs cautious manner, it would furprize none, if all the members of the inferior court were punished with death, as even the high fenate itfelf is not exempted.

The next two great courts are those of commerce and foreign affairs : Their names imply their natures. No court interferes with the business of another, except in some very particular cases.

The next court is the high fenate ; it confifts of many or few members, as the monarch commands ; 24 or 36 are commonly the number : They have a prefident ordained by the cabinet. In this court all inland affairs are debated and difcuffed ; but an appeal may be made to the cabinet : However, the appellant muft be fure that juffice is on his fide ; for, fhould it prove otherways, no lefs than death is the punifhment. This is the fupreme court of juffice and policy, to which all the courts of Ruffia, and all the provinces in it, must refort and address for directions and relief. This court is constantly kept where the Empress refides; that, in case of any difficulty, redress and directions may be had without loss of time.

The next two courts feem to be pretty equal in power and honour ; they are the waroffice and admiralty : They decide all affairs relating to the army and fleet, under the direction only of the cabinet. If money is wanted they apply to the fenate, if their demands are reafonable; but if refused or delayed, they only may, without danger of punifhment, apply to the cabinet. In all thefe courts, which confift of many members, the propofal is first debated, then the youngest members opinions are afked; and when the majority agree to it, it then becomes a law; but the minority have it in their power not to fubfcribe the refolution, without finding fault with it, fhould the refolution afterwards be difapproved by the cabinet; those who did not fubscribe it are never cenfured : Every member has a right to fubfcribe, and, if agreeable to his confcience, he ought to do it. Every dubious matter is reprefented to the cabinet for their approbation. If they act according to the regulations effablished by Peter the Great, they never can be found culpable, altho', for weighty reafons, the cabinet fometimes do at least modify, if not alter, those regulations.

TRAVELS.

. The last court is the policy. In every province there is a general provincial policy, and every city has a private policy. The inferiors must report regularly to their superiors. But all the provinces in Ruffia must report to St Peterfburgh-policy, and obey their orders. The policy is of very great ufe, and a great protection of the innocent and industrious, as it, without lofs of time, apprehends, and punifheth all fuch as are guilty of finaller crimes, takes up, examines, and punisheth all idle people, and vagrants, of whatfoever condition This way of expressing myfelf, by or rank. faying vagrants of whatfoever condition or rank, may appear frange to Britons; but it is, notwithstanding, extremely compatible with the conflitutions of that abfolute empire; for every nobleman and gentleman is obliged to ferve the flate, either in a civil or military capacity. Now there are fome who ablcond ; and fuch I term vagrants: For when they are difcovered, they will, though of the beft family, be feized by the policy, and fent to the department to which they belong, to fland trial, and the confequences of it. It is to be obferved here, that no court can try any perfon belonging to another department, except for capital crimes'; and in the courts of war and admirality, they are always tried by a court-marshal, of which I shall fay fomething prefently. No perfon whatfoever can travel from from one city or province to another, without a paffport from the department to which he properly belongs, fpecifying the number of his attendants. Any gentleman may grant a paffport to any of his household, but it must have annexed to it the policy feal. Peter the Great was fo very careful to prevent people travelling without proper paffports, that he conftantly used them himself, and had them regularly booked. Thus at this day even am-. baffadors, and field-marshals at the head of their victorious armies, must have paffports, and confequently all inferiors must fubmit to the fame regulation. It would be thought a great mark of flavery to be conftrained to have a paffport from Edinburgh to London, and that this paffport must be examined at every city through which the perfon paffeth. I cannot deny that it is fo; but ftill, in fuch an extensive country as Ruffia, I imagine it is very neceffary, and for the good of the people. The defign does not feem calculated only to keep people under great fubjection, but to prevent idle people from going about to rob, plunder, or fteal from their neighbours, and to protect the innocent, diligent, and ufeful fubject, and alfo to bring a finall revenue into the treafury. Suppose one with a regular passport, travelling from St Peterfburgh to Molcow, is robbed and murdered on the road, his friends are not long before they fulpect it. They immediately apply to the policy. The policy give notice in the the news-paper, and without loss of time fend off couriers to all towns through which he was defigned to pals, and orders to inferior policies to report when that perion paffed through their diffricts; at laft, e.g. they find that he paffed through Novogorod, but after that never was feen on the whole road to Mofcow. The governor of Novogorod iffues out orders for his dragoons to purfue, and raife the whole country, to fcour the deferts and woods. The country people at fuch a time never fail to feize all fuspected perfons, nor dare they harbour any who have no paffport; unlefs they are refolved to fuffer death. They also fend off expreffes to all the neighbouring provinces. Every perfon is ftrictly examined. Thus the reader will fee it is next to imposible that rogues or robbers fhould efcape, unlefs upon the borders. And although the robbers are foon feized, and punished with torture and a cruel death, the governor shall scarcely escape degradation ; and though he fhould have the greateft intereft, he will yet be fure to meet with a very fevere reprimand, and threatened if he does not keep better order, and a more strict out-look for the future. He is alfo mulcted, to make good at leaft what value was loft, when the unhappy man was murdered. The governor must bear all this ; but he alio mulcts his inferiors. Thus you fee how much it behoves every one to take great care of the traveller; for if he is taken ill of any natural difease. difeafe, and death enfues, a ftrict inquifition is made about every circumftance of his difeafe, what attendants he had, and what was done for his relief, that it may give his friends fatisfaction, and that they may recover what value he had, which his books or his attendants fhall difcover. The great use of the policy will appear from two remarkable inflances which I fhall here recite.

When the late great field-marshall Prince Michael Golitzin was a child, his mother (the old prince being dead) went out to the country, with her numerous family, to pafs a month in the fummer, for the benefit of the country air in the hot weather. She left Mofcow late in the afternoon with a numerous retinue, which, according to her rank, were well provided with arms. They had not travelled fifteen miles till they were attacked by a very great band of robbers. There were feveral noblemen and gentlemen of the army with her, who encouraged the fervants, and behaved themfelves fo gallantly, that they killed and wounded a good many of the robbers, not without lofs on their own fide : however, they could take no prifoners, and were even glad that it was no worfe. At the beginning of the conflict, the waggon, in which were the young prince with fome of his brothers and fifters, was in the rear. The waggoner, at the very beginning, turned the horfes, and drove for Mofeow with all fpeed, and loft no time time in acquainting the policy with what had happened, who, with all poffible expedition, fent off a numerous party to purfue and apprehend the robbers, who had built a cave in the middle of a thicket of thorns in a wood, and had fo well taken care of tracks, that the party, though they foon met with their horfes, were fome time before they found out themfelves. However, they were at laft difcovered, apprehended, and carried to Mofcow, where they were tried, convicted, and condemned to a moft cruel and ignominious death, which they defervedly fuffered.

The next inftance was that of a robbery, as I had it from a noble lady of great honour. A relation of her's, an old maiden lady, but very rich, kept a girl as waiting woman, for whom fhe had a great regard. A young fellow came frequently about the house to fell ribbands, beads, and other trinkets. During two or three months, he became perfectly acquainted with all the principal fervants, and having got a thorough knowledge of the houfe, he made his addreffes to the lady's waiting-woman, gave her many pretty prefents, told her that he was the fon of a rich merchant in Siberia, but had fpent a fum of money fince his arrival in Molcow, and therefore intreated her to let none in the houfe know his affairs nor his parentage. When he had obtained her confent to marry him, he got her alfo perfuaded, tho' against her inclination, not only to make a pri-1-111103

a private elopement from her good lady, but alfo to carry off her ftrong box, in which there was not only a round fum of ready fpecie, but alfo all the lady's jewels. It was in the winter feasion ; he had a fledge and a pair of good horfes ready, and fuddenly drove her out of Mofcow to a pit, where they throw all the dead bodies of felons and fuicides, and fuch as have no relations ; there they ly and are buried by a bishop once every year. At their arrival, the villain ordered her to prepare for immediate death, telling her that this place was the burial houfe of felons, and, as he had brought her there, he was determined to put her to death. A peafant, fome time before, going home drunk from Mofcow, and not being able to weather the cold, and an extraordinary drift of fnow, went under the cover of this pit, and fell afleep, but, by the noife of the threatenings of the villain, and the importunities of the poor girl, was not only wakened, but overheard their discourse. He, both brave and refolute, iffued out, making a terrible noife, and threatened the villain, who, frightened out of his wits, leapt into the fledge, and instantly drove off, leaving the maid with her drunken, but generous deliverer. This incident was very lucky for them both, becaufe had it not happened, the maid would certainly have been murdered, and the poor man had very likely been frozen to death. When the girl had recovered the ufe of her reafon, confined the informed the peafant of every thing fhe had done, and all that fhe knew of the villain. Upon this he congratulated her, but carried her directly to the police, where they both made oath of what they knew: but as they themfelves were unknown, they were confined till next day, when a meffage was fent to the lady, acquainting her with what had happened. The good old lady ufed all her influence to preferve her fervant from the punifhment due, procured her a pardon from the Emprefs, took her home, and got her comfortably married.

The police however loft no time in making proper fearch for the villain, and in a very few days got him, when, being convicted of his crime, he was broken on the wheel; and the lady got back almost the whole value fhe had loft. Long after this affair, the lady herfelf happened to be a patient of mine, and confirmed the foregoing account which I have given of it. From these two inflances then, the great use of a good policy in a despotic nation is obvious to every one.

Concerning the Policy of the Medicine Chancery and Council.

BEFORE I proceed to profecute my Journal, it will not, I hope, be deemed D improper 26

improper or unpleafing, that I here give fome account of the medical department, and of its powers and regulations, to which I belonged fifteen years.

The fupreme regulations of medical affairs were inftituted by Peter the Great, who, when in Holland, got acquainted with a Scotch Gentleman, Dr Erskine. Peter loved this phyfician, and prevailed upon him to go to Ruffia: He gave him great encouragment, he was declared to be the Emperor's principal Phyfician, and Director-General of all Phyficians, Surgeons, Apothecaries and their dependents within that vaft empire, and Chancellor of a court, called the Medicine Chancery; where every thing relating to that bufinefs. and all the branches of it are determined. Peter alfo, as I was well informed, preffed the Doctor to be one of his privy council; but of this honour he would never accept ; as he alledged, that altho' the Emperor had no difficulty of getting him acknowleged as fuch by the whole empire, yet he was certain, fuch . a ftep would not fail to procure him, or any other foreigner, many enemies : But it was believed, that notwithstanding this, the Emperor very frequently confulted him. It was Dr Erfkine who erected the Medicine Chancery, and planned out the fundamental regulations of it which are in force at this day. The Doctor was Prefident of this Chancery, and appointed a Phyfician (two fecretaries and many many writers, &c.) as Vice Prefident ; whole bufinefs it is to go to the Chancery once or twice a day, and ftay in it two hours at leaft. in the forenoon; and, if needful, as many in the afternoon; he receives all reports from all the provinces in Ruffia, from the armies, and fleet: He is obliged to acquaint the Prefident every morning and evening with whatever happens, and takes his directions, and iffues out orders accordingly. There is one Chancery in St Petersburg, and one in Molcow. The one is fubordinate to the other, as the court is at either of these places. The Chancery, upon any extraordinary affair, immediately conveens fuch a number of phyficians and furgeons as the prefident shall think proper, nor may any of them be absent, except they are fick. On the principal chancery does every branch of the medical affair abfolutely depend; nor dares any one practife in Russia, till he be examined and found qualified, either by the Chancery or its deputies, and get a written teftimonial of his qualifications. All phyficians must fubmit to this regulation, which effectually prevents quackry of all kinds. Some few quacks however, there are, tho'not in the imperial fervice ; but if any thing curious, uncommon, or remarkable, happens in their practice, they must immediately report the cafe to the Medicine chancery. The chanvery buys up all drugs, and takes care that every.

every drug be good of its kind. Thefe are delivered over to the principal apothecaries who must account for every ounce. There are indeed fome private apothecaries ; but they are as much fubject to the rules of the chancery as those employed by the empire. Every army of 40,000 men are allowed two phyficians and a furgeon-general. Every regiment is allowed one furgeon and a mate : and every company is allowed two, young men, who can let blood, fpread and apply plaifters, and do many other finall things. The regimental furgeons must be obedient to the directions of the phyficians and their general-furgeon, either jointly or feparately. The apothecaries must instantly difpense what medicines the furgeons require for the use of the regiments, if attefted by the furgeon-general, or any of the phyficians. The general hospital of the army must be vifited by the phyficians and furgeon-general, at leaft twice every week ; and every regimental-hofpital, as often as poffible, during the fummer. The furgeons must vifit all their fick twice every day, and if any extraordinary cafe happens, they must report it without lofs of time to the furgeon-general; and every regimental furgeon must report every month the ftate of the regiment, during the preceding month, to their furgeongeneral. The furgeon-general makes out a general report of the fick of the whole army, army, which, being figned by one of the phyficians and him, is fent to the Medicinechancery, by which means the Emprefs or cabinet, can every month, fee the flate of the army, in refpect of health and ficknefs. Except for crimes of the deepeft dye, no colonel dare arreft or otherways moleft their furgeons; becaufe they are accountable only to the medical department for their actions; and if they neglect their duty they are feverely punifhed.

In cafe of an accufation by a commander against the furgeon, a memorial is made out, and fent to the furgeon-general. He is obliged immediately to take cognizance of the crime : If it is of fuch a nature, that he thinks the fick are not to be longer trufted, to the furgeon, he appoints another, puts the furgeon under arreft, and reports to the chancery : The chancery orders, with the approbation and confent of the war-office, a council of war to fit upon the accufed, confifting of five officers, and two old furgeons: Whatever is done, is figned and fealed up, and fent to the chancery, who have it in their power to put the fentence in execution. or elfe, (which frequently happens) to moderate the feverity of it,

Concerning the Hofpitals in St Petersburgh.

DETER the Great erected two royal grand hofpitals in St Peterfburg. A defcription of them will fuffice to make any perfon fenfible of the nature of the fervice in every hofpital in Ruffia, as there is no difference in the regulations. One is for the army, the other for the fleet. They are joined together, compleating three fides of a very large fquare. In the middle of the fide facing the river Neva, is a fine church for the ufe of both hofpitals; the wards are very well contrived; the building is two ftories high, and covered galleries go quite round both hofpitals, fo as any perion may walk without being expoled to the injuries of the weather. At each corner of each hofpital is a noble theatre, and diffecting chamber. I have known nine freih bodies in it at once, belonging to the fea. hofpital. The theatre is large enough to contain two or three hundred fpectators. Here are kept a very great number of curiofities, and chirurgical cafes injected, or otherways preferved. It would be agreeable to the curious to have a hiftorical catalogue and defcription of these curiofities ; fome of mypreparations are thought worthy of a place there. Centinels are placed fo as to fuffer none none to go out or come in to the hofpital, except proper perfons. Several phyficians belong to them ; a fuperior furgeon, and five ordinary furgeons, ten fub-furgeons or mates, and twenty fludents to each. A profeffor of botany teaches the fludents of both hofpitals. Each hofpital has a profeffor of medicine and furgery, and a profeffor of anatomy, and a limner is appointed to teach fludents to draw any part of the human body. The Profeffors of medicine, furgery, and anatomy, are obliged to teach and examine twice every week in their feveral hofpitals ; but fo that the fludents of both may attend each profeffor.

The profeffor of botany teaches every lawful day, during the fummer. If any very difficult chirurgical operation is to be performed, the profeffor of anatomy is operator, unlefs he appoints one whom he can truft : but both phyficians and furgeons fhould be prefent.

If there has been any difpute about a difeafe, of which a patient died, the body muft not be interred until the caufe of death is difcovered by anatomical difquifition ; and the profeffor has a right to diffect a part of any dead body before burial: For the bodies of all malefactors, fuicides, and all who die in jail before execution, are fent to these hospitals. Every morning at fix o'clock, the bell warns the furgeons to get ready : At feven, it fignifies nifies their immediate attendance in the ward, where those who are wounded, ulcerated, or have fractured bones, or diflocated joints, are kept, or must make their repair from the other wards : In an inftant all hands are at work, until all the ordinary patients are dreffed.

Then fucceed confultations about patients labouring under more troublefome difeates : Ordinarily, young furgeons give their opinions firft, and fo on till the eldeft, joined with thofe of the phyficians and operator. Every one has a right to plead : The greateft number carry their defign, if fupported by either a phyfician, or a furgeon of known abilities. When the operation is performed, the caufe of the difeafe is always difcovered, if it be a member ; and when death happens, the caufe of it is likewife frequently developed ; but no man is found fault with, tho' his opinion fhould not be juft ; but ftill it does him great honour who foretold what happened.

I cannot help here relating a cafe, which happened whilft I attended that hofpital. At the exhibition of grand fire-works for the taking of Afoph from the Turks, the tail of a rocket fell upon the head, and fractured the fkull of a failor, who was immediately carried to the hofpital. Dr Mounfey and I attended, but could then neither fpeak the language of the country, nor high Germain, and but with few who underftood Latin. The operator afked our opinion. We both frankly told him, that not withftanding standing they could not difcover any fracture by any means they had tried, and that altho' the skull was laid bare, by a large wound, in which they could difcover no fracture, we were yet of opinion there was a fracture near that place; and thought that the trepan fhould be applied without loss of time. The reft did not join with us; but the professor faid that he fulpected what we advanced was but too true. A day or two after that (for neither of us would take care of him, as our advice was rejected) Dr Mounfey and I, both then very young, obferved that the patient was very flupid, which daily encreafed, and that his eyes weremuchinflamed, and had not their faculties; that the flaver run conftantly from his mouth, and that he feemed quite infenfible of pain.

We, talking concerning him, and feeming to finile, were obferved by the fupreme furgeon, a proud man, and of no great learning, who defired Mr Hanhart, profeffor of anatomy, to afk of us " the caufe of our mirth ?" We were fimple enough to tell him, which was the caufe of great jealoufy ever after ; and I doubt not of our being fo fpeedily ordered to the fervice of the navy.

A few days thereafter, the doctor and I returned to the hofpital. I went to the chamber of anatomy (having been appointed to affift the profeffor to prepare leffons of anatomy fome time before that) ac-E cording cording to cuftom : The door was made faft with a bit of twine fealed, which, in Ruffia, is reckoned more facred than even a lock. I, however, imagining it had been done by fome young men, thought nothing of it, (becaufe I had an undoubted right, by order of the Medicine-chancery ; nor could even the profeffor deprive one of this right, but by a counter-order from the chancery,) and therefore. with my knife, eafily made the door open : and observed a new body, fewed up in a matrefs, ready for burial. I inftantly cut that open alfo, knew the face, and found that they had fawn the fkull through, and not only found a great fracture, but many finall ones; and, in place of the left lobe of the brain, that fpace was full of putrid matter, &c. I instantly acquainted Dr Mounfey ; and left the body, without pretending to conceal what we had been about. Whilft we were talking of this affair, a young man, who fpoke Latin well, came and afked us, If we knew who had been in the anatomy-room ? I told him all we had done; and that I was ignorant the door had been made faft by order, or that a feal to a door, that properly belonged to me, could prevent my entrance, unlefs orders from the chancery were countermanded. of which I thought I ought previoufly to have been made acquainted, and finally that I should petition the Chancery properly concerning it. When he had reported what was faid faid to the first furgeon, a council was called, and I was afterwards affured, that this affair had put them in no fmall fright. Left I had put my threats in execution, the profeffor invited Dr Mounfey and me to fupper, and enjoined us fecrecy. He told us that he could not have his will for the first furgeon, who had great friends at court, and was alfo protected by the archiator; and that fuch protection was the principal cause of his almost always having had a majority of votes against him. Tho' this affair has but a very bad appearance, yet many excellent operations were performed, and many notable cures perfected during my ftay in this hospital.

From this ward, the furgeons proceed with the phyficians through all the remaining wards: The furgeons mates write down in a day-book what the phyficians order for every perfon ; to which book their names and difeafes are prefixed. After all the patients have been vifited, the furgeons mates go with their ftudents to the apothecary, where they attend till the medicines are prepared; carry them to the respective wards, and exhibit them as was directed : One of the furgeons in ordinary watches by turns (this is called dejour) in the hofpital every day ; nor is it lawful for him, who is on watch, to go out of the hofpital, unlefs he get another furgeon to fupply his place ; and they must both go to the furgeon in chief, and acquaint him with their agreement agreement. The reft of the furgeons may attend their private patients, but must return at 7 o'clock p. m. The mates, as they are not allowed to practife, nor the students, can go no where from the hospital, without leave from the principal furgeon.

Reports of the number of fick entered, cured, dead, and remaining, with the names of the different difeafes, are regularly fent to the Chancery every week. There are no want of all forts of attendants. The beft of food is plentifully allowed them by the phyficians order, as alfo drinks and decoftions of all kinds; nor are the most expensive wines spared, when neceffary. If a complaint is made either of the phyficians, furgeons, or their mates, for non-attendance one day, they are mulcted in one month's falary; and, on those who bear no rank, corporal punifhment is inflicted.

By every hofpital is appointed an officer whole bufinels it is to provide all forts of provisions, and keep a just account of the fame: A number of writers are appointed to affift him. He has alfo the charge of the foldiers who keep watch about the hospital, but can punish none without liberty from the principal furgeon. The prefidents of the admiralty and war-office either go themselves, or depute others to see that every thing is in good order; and the commanders in chief of less hospitals, at greater distance from court, attended by a fiscal fifcal, enquire every week, If the fick have good wholefome provifions, and well-dreffed, according to the phyficians orders? Though the phyficians, furgeons, &c. give due attendance, yet if any complaint is made, which I have known to happen, ftrict inquifition will follow; but if the complaint is groundlefs, the patient who made it is carefully cured, and, when difmiffed, is feverely whipped before the whole command.

If a delirious man is difcontented, no notice is taken of his complaints. It is a regulation through all Ruffia, that every furgeon, whether in the fervice or not, is obliged in difficult cafes to call for the advice of fome regular phyfician or fenior furgeon, whether the cafe is internal, or purely chirurgical; nor dare any furgeon perform an operation on any perfon, without previoufly having had the advice and concurrence of fuch, if poffible to be got. If the patient fhould die, or have reafon to complain, the prefumptuous furgeon would not efcape punifhment. Where there is difficulty or danger, even phyficians are obliged to call the advice of others, if to be had; and if they neglect to do fo, and death fhould follow, they will not escape punishment. I knew two phyficians who, for fuch neglect and malpractice, were inftantly expelled the fervice. No apothecary dare give medicines without orders from a phylician or furgeon. At every grand apothecary's flop a good furgeon is is appointed with a fufficient falary to attend daily two hours forenoon and afternoon, to give advice to the poor; and if fuch are not able to pay for the medicines, the apothecary notwithstanding difpenfeth them, and placeth fuch to the aid of the Empress. If any perfon, not having a licence from the Medicine Chancery, fhould prefume to give medicines to patients, the penalty is no lefs than to fuf-. fer the knute, to be fent to the galleys during pleafure, and confifcation of all he has, one half for the Emprefs, the other to the informer. If any attendant or fervant fhould give any medicines, meats or drink, to a fick perfon, not authorifed by the phyfician, he fhall not, when difcovered, efcape a fevere whipping.

Concerning military regulations.

CONCERNING military affairs, I am afraid, I can fay but little to the fatisfaction of the gentlemen of that honourable profession. However, the following is a fair account of the military regulations in the Russian empire. In general, every perfon of the smallest distinction in the imperial fervice hath fome rank : Thus, for instance, a ship builder is a Colonel, and gets the honour of that character paid him in all all places. A Generalifimo is the highest officer in the army; Field-marshall, General Lieutenant-general, Major-general, Brigadier, and fo on, form the feveral gradations, and end in the enfign. The inferior ought to report daily to his fuperior concerning the truft repofed in him; and his reports must be true, elfe he ftands a chance of being reduced by a court-martial. Every inferior must readily obey the orders he gets from his fuperior, no matter how dangerous; and if an inferior is ordered on irregular duty, he dares not difobey the orders, but has it in his power to complain of his commander; and if it fhould be found that he has acted contrary to the regulations, unlefs the inferior pardon him before the court-martial is ended, the fuperior runs a great rifque of being rendered incapable, at leaft for a time, during which he has neither rank nor falary. If a fuperior ftrikes an inferior, which fometimes happens in drunken fquabbles, when the complaint is made, fuppofe by an enfign, the fuperior officer is obliged (let his rank be what it will) to appear before the whole command of which he is fuperior, and there on his knees beg pardon of the gentleman, receive the fame blows from the provoft, and pay three years falary to him whom he had injured.

If a fuperior infults an inferior, by names or language beneath a gentleman to give or take, he will be obliged before the command, on his knees to beg pardon, acknowledge his fault, and pay three years falary to the inferior he had infulted.

on

CHAP. VIII.

Differences of ranks in the fleet and army.

THE higheft officer in the fleet is Lord high Admiral, and after him are the Admiral, Vice-admiral, Reer-admiral, Commodore, Captain, and fo on, down to the midshipman, who ranks with a lieutenant in the army.

The higheft officers in the fleet and army are equal, and take their precedency only from the dates of their commiffions. A commodore is brigadier; a captain in the navy is colonel; a licutenant is primier major; and the regulations by way of command is much the fame as in the army.

If a fuperior officer, whether in the fleet, army, artillery, or engineer, arrives in any garrifoned city, the commander of which is an inferior, he immediately makes his repair to him, reports the flate of the garrifon, demands his written orders, parole, &c. and thus refigns the command, while his fuperior refides in the place. Whenever a general officer enters a fortified place, a number of cannon are difcharged, to denote the quality lity of the ftranger, that every one may take notice of, and properly refpect him.

The late Empress Elizabeth, however, caufed the officers, who had that honour done them, immediately pay the expense of the falute; which is not great, in regard they have all the materials, and make as good powder as any in Europe.

The different degrees of honour in the army.

THE army has different degrees of precedency. The guards are the moft honourable, the cuiraffiers are next, the dragoons fucceed, the infantry are the laft of regulars, but one regiment demands the poft of honour according to the date of their creation. The irregular light horfe called huzzars are next in place : The Coffack granadier regiments preceded by the Coffack horfe, are the laft, except the Barbarian Calmuicks. Over and above thefe are the trains of artillery, a moft glorious body of men. The cannon and mortars are all of brafs. The engineers are likewife very honourably refpected; their officers are equal in rank with thofe of the fleet.

In St Peterfburg is a large palace, and many buildings belonging to it, as alfo a large fine garden : it formerly belonged to Prince Mentzicoff.

Mentzicoff. This man was, I think, difgraced in the Emprefs Ann's reign, when every thing he had was confifcated for the Emprefs's ufe. This great palace was allotted for the education of poor gentlemen's children in the military way, and the children of foreigners who had ferved the empire, and is called the Cadets Core. In my time, it was faid to give good lodging to fifteen hundred, with their officers; now, I am told, the number is two thoufand. A general officer, with a good falary and lodging, is commander in chief. They are divided into companies ; every company has a captain, lieutenant and enfign, with rank equal to the guards. They are all lodged in this house, and there is but one grand entry into it. Children are received at the age of feven years. Here they are taught all the European languages, writing, arithmetic, mathematicks, and every branch of natural philofophy, painting, dancing, and fencing. One hundred mount guard daily, and ferve in every fhape as common foldiers. Those who are not on guard are fludying. The mafters are not allowed to punish them, but only to mark down their faults : They are not to be whipped with a birch, or any other common rod of correction, becaufe they are gentlemen ; but have a piece of fine fteel made in form of a fword, very thin, long, but not fharp. For flight crimes they are confined in the guardhouse, for greater they must ride the wooden. mare.

mare; for heinous crimes they are flogged with this fword. If they are not to be kept in order, they are feverely whipped with rods, the Cadets uniform torn from them, they forfeit the title of gentlemen, and are referved to ferve as common foldiers in the army. If they are of age, difcreet and diligent, they are advanced firft to corporal, then captain at arms, laftly to ferjeants of their own corps. When they have ferved honourably till they are feventeen or eighteen, they are difmiffed to the army, as captains, lieutenants, or enfigns. None dare abfent themfelves without leave afked and given.

They bear a mortal hatred to the guards, and the guards to them, the effects whereof are fometimes very terrible, and numbers are killed on both fides The guards are all accoutered with broad fwords: the cadets with finall tucks. If the guard-foldier gets one blow, the cadet is no more; but very frequently the cadet fhuns the blow, and before the guard-foldier can be ready to give another, the cadet runs him through. In order as much as poffible to prevent fuch exceffes, the cadets were not allowed by the emprefs Elizabeth to go to the fouth fide of the Neva with their fwords, nor were the guards allowed to go to their fide armed ; and this prohibition has, I am told, had a very good effect.

Regulations for widows and orphans in the Ruffian fervice and religion.

THE male children of Ruffian officers have each of them, after their father's death, one fourth of his annual falary, till they are ten years of age; the girls have the fame till they are fifteen; at which time it is thought the boys may be provided for in the Cadets core, and the girls are then thought to be fit for marriage. The widows, if young, have one year's falary, if old, they have one fourth, fo long as they live, paid them annually.

Soldiers boys, as foon as they are born, enter into fmall pay till they are five years of age, when they must go to a military school: They have allo a man's provision; but the girls have no allowance. In every garrifoned town there is kept a military fchool. The boys have all of them one uniform. A captain prefides to keep order : they also keep guard upon the fchool, and are taught to read, write, and keep accompts ; but if any of them rather chufe to beat the drum, or play upon any martial mufical inftrument, they are encouraged ; but the dolts, who difcover no genius, are kept clofe to the exercife of arms. If an officer of rank approaches towards the fchool, the whole guard CHAP guard turns out to pay their refpects with their wooden guns, inftruments of mufic, and drums, according to their ranks.

In Ruffia every religion is tolerated, providing ftrangers do not diffurb the effablished religion, which is of the Greek communion. When Peter the Great first introduced foreigners into his fervice, many fquabbles happened, and frequently murders; whereupon that wife prince ordered, under a most fevere penalty, that none of the different religions should different with or infult one another on that fcore; which order hath had its full effect, by preventing confusion, and promoting government.

It cannot be expected I can fay much about the religion of the Ruffians, as it formed but a finall part of my ftudy. They worfhip every day, and the clergy are feemingly fincere and devout; but this is all farce and affectation, as their manners are motley, and their morality is deficient. This remark, however, will, I am afraid, apply, more or lefs, to all the preachers and profeffors in the world, namely, that their practice is not analagous to their precepts.

Concerning the Ruffian religion, their churches, &c.

THE Greeks have many holy-days. I imagine they have at leaft a faint for every day in the year; but they at the fame time have many and very fevere long fafts, which, one with another, engrofs nearly one half of the year: they have allo auricular confeffions, invoke, and pray to faints.

The walls of their churches are hung round with pictures of faints, and fome of them extremely rich. They make use of fumigations and holy water, extreme unction, passforts for the dead, and prayers after death to relieve the dead out of purgatory. They have many other ceremonies, which I do not remember; but the burial of Christ, and the fanctifying of the water, are the most remarkable. They baptize by three feveral immerfions, and making the fign of the cross.

I was once at the celebration of the burial of Chrift crucified, and, as I rightly remember, it was performed in the following manner in the metropolitan church in Aftrachan, From the altar, which is always on the eaft end, next to the fanctum fanctorum, and to which no layman may approach, a large ftage was erected two foot above the floor, covered with carpets.

On

On the weft end of this ftage was a chair facing the altar, and a table before it, covered with clean linen, and on it a large filver bafon of water, and a comb. On each fide of the ftage were placed fix chairs. After a long fervice, the archbifhop appeared in an ordinary fattin toga, performed fome part of duty on the altar, and bleffed the people three times : at each time he made the fign of the crofs with two candlefticks, in one of which were three wax candles, in the other, two.

I was told the three wax candles were an emblem of the Ever-bleffed Trinity; but I have forgotten the meaning of the two. After this folemn act was over, he difappeared, and paffed into the fanctum fanctorum. Twelve bithops, or first dignitaries in the diocefe, walked gravely, in fuperb facerdotals, from the altar, fix on each fide of it, and feated themfelves on chairs: They reprefented the twelve apoftles. When they were placed, the archbishop again appeared, followed by two deacons and other church-officers, with fingers, chanting in the most charming manner. He, with an awful air and a folemn gait, walked along, and feated himfelf on the weft end of the ftage. The fingers ftopped, and a deacon, with profound reverence, prefented to him a comb, with which he combed his head and beard, then washed his face and hands, and girded himfelf with a linen cloth, the deacon carrying a bowl of water after him, wherewith he

he washed one foot of each of the twelve bifhops. One of them who reprefented St Peter challenged him for washing his feet : The difcourfe betwixt them was what happened betwixt Chrift and Peter, when the Saviour of mankind washed his ministers feet. Then he was dreffed by the deacons with the richeft robes I ever faw, with a crown of gold upon his head, thick befet with pearls, diamonds, rubics, and other precious frones. The twelve bifhops were also dreffed in extremely rich cloaths, and many pearls upon them; they had also every one a crown, but inferior to that of the archbilhop. After this was ended, they all returned to the fanctum fanctorum, when one of the priefts appeared, and told the audience that Chrift was dead, whereon they departed feemingly in great forrow. This was acted on Friday. The whole citizens appeared little on the ftreets on Saturday, and many of them eat nothing from the time of Friday's ceremony till Sunday morning ; but the cooks were every where fet to work on Saturday afternoon, to prepare the moft delicious meals of all kinds againft Sunday. I was told, but did not fee it, that a coffin was really buried on Friday, and was exposed empty in the church on Sunday morning. On Sunday morning, affoon as the clock had ftruck twelve, the bells tolled for fervice : However, I did not chufe to rife, but was told, that, after a piece of fervice was performed, the archbifhop bifhop appeared, and, after bleffing the people, affured them that Chrift was rifen from the dead. Upon this a rocket, placed at the church-door, was played off as a fignal, which was immediately fucceeded by a round of all the cannon in the citadel and the city, which never fails to give notice to all the abfent inhabitants, who are not dead or deaf, of the final end of this affair ; and then men and women congratulate one another upon this happy occafion, offering an egg, and a friendly kifs.

I was told, thefe laft ceremonies are reckoned fo effential, and are fo ftrictly adhered to, that if a common foldier were to meet the Emprefs, and offer an egg, declaring his belief, he would have the honour of an imperial kifs. In fhort, after the laft fervice is over, every one reforts to his home, and eats and drinks as much as he is able : For eight days the jubilee is univerfal; with fome it lafts longer, which, in refpect of my intereft, I found convenient, as furfeits feldom go off without the doctor's aid.

The fast, which is very strict, continues feven weeks : This is fucceeded by a voracious eating, and plenty of the ftrongeft liquor, which never fails to bring many to their beds. and not a few to their graves.

A description of the christening of the water.

"HE following is a fhort account of the manner of chriftening the water, as I faw it in St Peterfburgh and other places. A fquare hole is dug through the ice about fix feet one fide, befide which are laid a great number of dales after the manner of a floor, fenced around with pales to keep off the mob, with a canopy over it. The fervice being finished, the clergy iffue from the principal church, and form a proceffion, following one another according to their dignity, and walking four or five in a line, to the number of fome hundreds. A great flag of the crofs, a large lanthorn, and a large picture of our Saviour, or fome faint, are carried amongft them. They proceed in this order, followed by the principal, and common people, finging hymns all the way to the river. The priefts enter the fquare with but a few of the principal people, and there perform other parts of the ceremony. When the water is faid to be fufficiently fanctified, a fignal is given to 1200 guards, who furround the whole in three lines, and immediately begin a running fire, which is thrice repeated : then the great guns in the citadel begin, and alfo fire about 300 cannon thrice. Thus ends this ceremony, which is performed much after the fame manner through all Ruffia. Many fick fanaticks go to be immerfed in this holy water, in order to be relieved from their complaints; and indeed many of them meet with their defire, but not in the way they expected ; that is to fay, they are killed by the exceffive coldness of the weather, the ceremony being performed in the middle of winter. Many ignorant fools carry their infants, fome of them new born, to be immerfed : They are delivered to the priefts, who duck them thrice over head and ears; fome happen to be flifled, fome have dropped from the prieft's hands, and been carried under ice by the ftream : When this happens, it is faid that God took them to himfelf; but many more die of the cold, not have without a woman, he much eiventh

300

CHAP. XIII.

Of the different degrees and customs of the clergy.

THERE are many different degrees of the clergy in Ruffia : They formerly had a patriarch ; but Peter the Great abolished that dignity, as an office of too great power for a subject ; in place of which he constituted a fynod at St Petersburgh, to be near the court. The fynod determines all ecclesiaftical affairs; but if it is thought to be of great consequence, or if any new regulation is to be made, their opinions are first transmitted to the patriarch of Constantinople, and from him to the patriarch of Jerusalem, to get their assent and approbation : When this is obtained, it is a fixed law through the whole Greek church.

They have archbifhops, bifhops, protopapas, and papas, deacons, and monks; I'm not certain but there are more degrees. The archbifhops, bifhops, or archimandrites are always elected from the monks, who take the vow of celibacy : The protopapas and papas, as they are allowed to marry only one wife, never can expect to rife higher in the church. If any of the clergy are found incontinent, they are put to death. The protopapas and papas, or ordinary priefts, may marry one woman ; but if fhe dies, and he is afraid he cannot live without a woman, he must give up the church, and take to any other bufinefs ; then he may marry as other laymen do. None in the Greek church are allowed to marry beyond three times, and ever after, let his conflitution be what it will, he can have no wife; but the keeping of a miftrefs is not thought fo deadly a fin here as elfewhere, if they only take care of their progeny. Adultery is reckoned a very great crime ; but the punifhment, if only papa knows it, is many profirations to fome faint daily, for a long time : But if a hufband can prove his wife guilty with anoto the ther ther man, fhe is divorced, and the adulterer punifhed.

The punifiment for fornication is fmall. the prieft appoints fo many times invoking God's forgiveness through the day, accompanied with proftrations. And the law orders. if a child happens to be born, only that the man buy for his miftrefs a milk cow. All the time I was in Ruffia. I never heard of a childmurder but one. It is to be feared, that our abfurd cuftom in Scotland of obliging offenders against chastity to perform public penance, the very dregs of popery, is the chief, if not the only caufe of infant-murder ; for our females have as fine fenfations, and as feeling an humanity as any in the univerfe; but the dread of public fhame and difgrace drives fome of them to defperation, and makes them do with their hands what they abhor in their hearts. Fornication, no doubt, is an offence against order, but child-murder is fo flocking an affair, and is fo frequent in Scotland, that it calls aloud for means more powerful and more effectual than any that have been hitherto employed to prevent it : And were the clergy to part with, or knock down their flool of repentance, it would, I am confident, fave nineteen of twenty children, who now fuffer as a facrifice to the terrors of the mother's fhame.

Humanity will forgive this difagreeable digreffion, from which I return to my flory.

There

There are many very beautiful monafteries. in Ruffia, full of priefts and monks : An archbifhop or archimandrite generally prefides in them. They are not only extremely rich in jewels, filver, and gold, but have annexed to them, for their fupport, many large territories: I obferved, however, not without concern, that the peafants belonging to the church were kept in greater flavery and poverty than those belonging to the most profligate gentlemen. The only reafon I can give for it is this, that the clergy, generally fpeaking, are derived from the dregs of the people, and have not had fo liberal an education as the gentlemen, nor fuch noble fentiments of humanity inftilled into their early years; hence that almost total want of it, when they rife to dignity and renown.

The gentlemen are very different now from what they were before: They are all of them employed fome way or other in the imperial fervice; the old ones are dead, and, fince the Great Peter's time, there are very few of them who have not made the tour of Europe.

The greateft care is taken of their education: They are not prieft-ridden now, as was formerly the cafe; and were any of them to use his peafants as the priefts do theirs, he would not only be hiffed by the reft, but no man of either honour or judgment would regard him.

The prefent Empress hath, I am told, relieved countrymen belonging to the church from fuch fuch flavery. She has wifely conferred proper falaries upon them, which makes the hearts of thoufands leap for joy. It was a bold ftroke ! but it feems, hitherto at leaft, to have been done with great judgment. The defign was good and god-like, and one fifth of the whole empire have felt its glorious effects, for I am convinced, that a number of people not inferior to that proportion were formerly fubject to the facerdotal jurifdiction.

THERE is an academy established at St. Peterfburgh, by Peter the Great. This academy has a fufficient number of profeffors of all arts and fciences. The Great Peter was at much pains to give encouragement to the learned of all countries to come there. He endowed them liberally with royal falaries, and other emoluments ; but I'm forry to fay, that before I left Ruffia, fome were dead, others had retired to their native countries diffatiffied, and the few who remained were much difpleafed at being neglected, and having an ignorant perfon placed at their head, as prefident ; who, by his great power, and protection from court, made the Empress believe that fine had fome of her natives qualified to Sul I become become profeffors. The foreign profeffors, who were mostly Germans, could do no more than make their distress known to their friends.

The building is a noble large pile of two ftories high, with a beautiful cupola in the middle, and an obfervatory. In the middle, below the cupola, is a fquare fpace about thirty foot long and thirty broad, without flooring, but a large gallery is built round it, one for each ftory, fo that one can fee from the pavement of the houfe to the top of the cupola. In each of thefe galleries are kept all manner of natural and artificial curiofities, as alfo a good library.

In one of the galleries in a cafe, is the fkin of a Frenchman, tanned and ftuffed: This has been the talleft man I ever faw. In another cafe was his fkeleton, and a pair of breeches made of his wife's fkin, alfo dreffed; the leather was like to buff.

On the bottom, or pavement, ftands the fkin of an Englifh chefnut horfe, ftuffed, faddled and bridled, and befide it the fkeleton. Peter the Great ufed to ride this horfe. Amongft the curiofities are very many abortions, and great variety of monftrous births, as alfo Ruyfch's compleat collection. Here I faw the head of the unfortunate Mifs Hamilton, a Swedifh lady, who loft it for havnig murdered her child, unlawfully begotten; and this is the only murder of that kind I ever heard of in Ruffia. This This lady was maid of honour to the Emprefs Catharine. It is faid Peter went and faw her executed: He wept much, but could not prevail with himfelf to pardon her, for fear, as is faid, that God would charge him with the innocent blood fhe had fhed. He caufed her head to be capped, and injected. The forehead is almost compleat; the face is the beautifullest my eyes ever beheld; the dura mater and brain are all preferved in their natural fituation: This is kept in fpirits, in a large chryftal vessel.

I faw three great chambers; in one of them were all manner of earths, foffils, ftones, ores, and natural metals, and minerals; in the other, all forts of fhells, moffes, corals, &c. and in the third fat in an elbow-chair, in waxwork, as big as the life, the Great Peter, dreffed in a blue coat and waift-coat, and breeches, white ftockings, his legs acrofs, uncovered, having a head of fhort black hair, with an hanger by his fide. About him in the room were all the fine mechanical and mathematical inftruments he ufed to take delight in, and many pieces of work which he made without the help of others.

In another part of the houfe I was fhown a very large globe; I forget whether it was celeftial or terreftrial. It opened on one fide, into which three or four people went and fat upon benches round a table. This was thought a very great curiofity. This edifice was burnt down in the year 1745 or 46; but most of the books, papers, and curiosities in it were faved, and it was again rebuilt.

The Admiralty is on the fouth fide of the river, oppofite the Academy : It is almost a fquare; one of the fides facing the river is fortified only with chevaux de frize; the other three fides are furrounded by a high rampart of earth, upon a wall of ftone eight or ten feet high, above the water of a very deep and broad foffee; the rampart is flanked with good baftions, and the whole well ftored with many brafs cannon. There are three entries into the admiralty over draw-bridges; on each fide is one. Within this fortification are noble buildings, containing offices for every thing belonging to the royal navy. Many fhips, floops, and boats are built here. I faw the Royal Anne launched, a fhip which carried 1 20 pieces of brafs cannon. There is a tower, and on the top of it an high fpear, covered with copper, double gilt, with a fhip on the top of all, of the fame metal, and alfo double gilt.

On the north fide of the river, further to the east than the admiralty, is the caftle, built upon an ifland. It has but two entries over drawbridges. A very large and deep ditch runs from the Neva quite round, till it again rejoins the Neva. I believe it is as flrong as is possible for the best engineers to make it. The fortification is all of stone; the walls are very high, and defended by ftrong baftions, mounted with the best brafs cannon. However, like the Tower of London, it is for little use, other than that of a state-prison. I have no notion it can in any fhape protect St Petersburgh, tho' I am positive it is capable, in a short time, to lay the whole city in afhes. Within this caftle are many large magazines, all of them bombproof, and many neceffary buildings, barracks, and prifons. In the middle of it is a very beautiful church, with a fet of mulicbells : On the head of the belfry is a high fpear like that in the admiralty, terminating at the top with a crofs richly gilt. The great Peter lies interred in this church, and I believe all the royal family from his time. A centinel ftands day and night at the place of interment. Here is one very large ivory branch, fit to hold 100 candles, the handy work of Peter the Great.

by

Further eaft, on the other fide of the Neva, oppofite the royal hofpitals, formerly taken notice of, is the foundery, a very noble building, with a fpear topped with a burning bomb, all double gilt. In this foundery are caft the beft cannon, mortars, and bombs in the world.

On the weft end of St Petersburgh, is a wharf for building ships of small burthen, and machines called camels; they are used to carry great ships over the bar, for Cronstad. They are hollow boxes, and so constructed ftructed, that, when full ofwater, one of them brought to each fide of the fhip is funk as low as to receive betwixt them the keel and bottom of the fhip: Then they are locked together, and, when well fecured, the water is thrown out by a great number of pumps. In proportion as the water is pumped out, fo does the fluip locked in them rife; for when they have the whole weight of the ship to support, they do not draw 4 foot water, and the bar does not exceed 6 or 7 foot. When the apparatus is adjusted, and there is but little wind, the fhip is towed over the bar. I went once on board a 70 gun thip that was just got over the bar. When the wind rofe and blew hard, I obferved that the feamen were very much alarmed, for fear of their anchors not holding ; but the ship was very fast in the camels, and the motion of both was fcarcely perceptible.

On the weft end of Vafilie Offrof, or the weftermoft ifland belonging to St Petersburgh, Peter the Great built a fine well fortified haven for his galleys. I belonged to this port about 6 months : There are faid to be contained in it 200 galleys : A few are fent to fea every fummer, in order chiefly to keep the men in practice. A great officer, called general of the galleys, is commander in chief. No perfon is allowed to enter this fortification, unlefs he is well known. It is about an English mile to the weft of St Petersburgh burgh, and from it you have a fine profpect of the gulf of Finland.

Of the exchange and markets.

ON the weft end of the fame ifland is the cuftom-houfe, and the exchange, where, as in London, the merchants meet. The exchange is nothing elfe than a very great timber stage, built one half of it on that branch of the Neva which washeth the east fide of the ifland. It is about 300 paces long, and proportionally broad. Near to it is a most noble magazine for preferving merchandize ; it is a fquare built with brick, and has only one great port or entry. An hundred foldiers keep watch here day and night, that no harm may happen to the merchants goods. A merchant. may have a very large room for paying ten shillings per month. The fide of the stage next the river is well lined with fhips of a fmaller burthen, during the fummer feafon, for the readier difpatch of bufinefs.

Near the fouthermost part of the city is the market-place, where all forts of goods, both home and foreign, are kept to be fold. It is a very large fquare with four entries; on each fide whereof is a range of shops, both within and without. There are covered galleries built built quite round the fquare, both on the out and infide, that people may be defended from rain. A ftranger need not, as in other places, hunt through this great city for what he wants to buy: A pleafant walk in thefe galleries will give him an opportunity of feeing many of the beft people in St Peterfburgh, and all forts of commodities in the world. The younger merchants and their fervants guard it during the night, and in it great order and decency are always obferved.

A general description of the City, &c.

THE river Neva runs out of a large lake called Ladoga, about twenty miles east from St Petersburgh. In the mouth of the river is fituated that strong fort called Schluffelburg, which Peter the Great took from the Swedes. Prince Michael Golitzin took this city by storm. He landed his foldiers on the island in boats and canoes; many were killed by the artillery; the Prince Marshall was almost killed with a stone thrown down from the walls. Peter at a distance faw the great loss of his men; and, of six couriers which he fent to raife the store, only one arrived stafe. The prince however would not desist till he had taken the place; at which time he made the the Emperor fenfible, that, if he had retreated' he would undoubtedly have loft all his men. This prince was the greatest general the Ruffians had, during the Swedish war. The lake is about 250 miles long, and very near as broad. Much merchandize was formerly fent from Ruffia and all the bordering countries about the Ladoga to the different ports in the gulf of Finland, and many veffels were annually loft; to prevent which, this great and magnanimous monarch (when he had taken Schluffelburg, which fignifies the key city, becaufe it was a key either into Ruffia or Sweden), caufed cut a large canal betwixt the rivers Volcholf and Neva, with twenty-feven locks or fluices, through which veffels may be conveyed quite fafe for the finall expence of a ruble betwixt thefe two rivers. This canal is on the weft fide of the Ladoga.

The topography of St Peterfburgh is out of my plan; wherefore I fhall leave it to others who have more leifure, after having made the following remarks. The guards are reckoned to be about 12 or 13,000; 15,000 field troops are alfo conftantly kept in the neighbouring villages, called the Petersburgh corps. Every ftreet, lane, or avenue, have many great gates which are flut in the night time : At each gate is a watchman, as in London, with a pole and a great rattle, (having convenient watch-houfes through the whole city)like thofe with which the farmers here fright away the fowls fowls from their grain. Thefe watch-men are appointed to prevent robberies and thefts, and to give warning if fire or any thing elfe alarming fhould happen during the filent watches of the night. No perfon is allowed, either in machines, on horfe back, or on foot, to pafs the ftreets without a lanthorn. If offenders are obferved, they are feized, and fent to the police.

The north of Petersburgh is built, as was faid, upon iflands, and has the advantage of water-carriage by the branches of the beautiful Neva, than which no chryftal is more pervious or transparent. The fouth part, which is properly called Peterfburgh, is alfo well fupplied with all conveniencies by many canals, but chiefly two large ones, both deep and broad, the fides of which are faced with hewn ftones. These canals are almost femi circles. They take their rife out of the Neva on the eaft, and, running through the city, difembogue themfelves into the Neva again on the weft. Where the ftreets (which are all broad, well paved, and formed in ftraight lines, where poffible), cut thefe canals, there are built large draw-bridges ; and that the common people may have no pretext for leaving naftinefs in any part of the ftreets, convenient places are built upon the banks of the river and its canals: Befides, all houfes which are built two ftories high, and in ftraight lines, are well fupplied with every conveniency conveniency to keep the city fweet and clean. Any perfon wanting to have his court or part of his property improved, may demand from the flaves-prifon as many flaves as are fufficient. The number is immediately fent under a guard of foldiers. When the bufineis is compleated, it is cuftomary to give the foldiers a finall acknowledgment for their care; but little or nothing to the flaves. These flaves are delinquents who deferve death; but not having committed murder, they are condemned to flavery for life; and others, for finaller crimes, only for a limited time. Hackneys, porters, watermen, and all forts of publick fervants, have a number on their fhoulders. They dare not impose on the stranger left they be detected. They are all fubject to the policy ; and if they commit any roguery, it is not fufficient that they reftore what they have taken, and pay all expences ; but they will be feverely whipped on the bare back. If they are not able to reftore what they have embezzeled, then they are not only whipped, but turned over to the galleys; where they must remain till the perfon injured is fatisfied.

A continuation of the fame, and of Peterhoff.

The Empress has a large play-house in the city, with German and French actors; also a fet of Italian fingers. No person pays for going to either play or concert; but none are allowed to enter, except fuch as have tickets by authority. The doors are guarded; and if any should get in without proper right, they would be severely punissed. No irregularity can happen here, as the royal family are frequently present; and it would be esteemed most criminal and inexcusable to commit any fuch folly in the presence of the Monarch of Ruffia.

Weft from St Peterfburgh, about 20 miles, is that beautiful country-feat of the Emprefs, called Peterhoff, after Peter the Great, who formed it. Here, on the top of a rifing ground, is a palace, and a great number of neceffary houfes for attendants. The palace is built by itfelf, eaft and weft : The front is fouth : It is fituated in the middle of a large garden ; and in the centre of it, on the fouth of the palace, is a very large pond of water, clear as chryftal. When the Emprefs refides here, the guards are encamped in the garden to the fouth : Their tents and regularity make a very fine appearance. The garden den on the north, is betwixt the palace and the gulf of Finland: It contains many acres of ground, and has in it many pleafure-houfes, cafcades, jetts, and waterworks. A large cascade 30 or 40 feet broad, runs from under the pavement of the palace, and, in its egrefs, falls down large steps made of hewn ftone, floping about 20 or 30 feet : Then it flies over the entry of a large grotto, 16 or 18 feet perpendicular, upon a pavement of hewn ftone, and, at laft, lofes itfelf in a very large circular bason, of at least 40 feet in diameter, ever full, but never overflowing : From the middle of which, fprings up a fplendid fpout or jett of water, which rifes to a great height; and is, I was told, larger than the famous one in France. Out of the water, much to my agreeable furprife, arofe a dog and three ducks, made of copper or iron, and in appearance all alive : The ducks fluster through the water quacking, the dog follows after them barking. There is, in a fubterraneous place, a charming chime of chryftal bells, which play by water. The grotto, of which I fpoke, covered before with the cafcade, has two entries, one at each fide of it. The entries are guarded by ftatues, which, when you are in, prevent any getting out, till the keeper, by turning a handle, puts a ftop to them. These statues evacuate fo much water, by vomiting and fhooting out of ftone piftols and guns, that, the keeper faid, it would would founder any man. The bottom is of channel, interfperfed with a very great number of finall pipes, imperceptible to the unwary ftranger. The keeper placed us in certain niches, where we could fee every thing, and not a drop of water touch us. He then turned a handle, upon which thefe pipes played with very great force, fo that the perpendicular jetts role near as high as the roof. The roof and walls were all covered with rock, and different forts of mols. It would take up too much time to defcribe the various pleafure-houfes, and vegetables in this beautiful garden ; wherefore I shall only add, that, befides the curiofities before mentioned, there is a beautiful gallery full of the fineft china in the world : At one end of which is a finall, but commodious room, with a bed in it, whither the Emprels fometimes retires to repole herfelf.

Of Ranyboam, Ruffian laws, nobility and gentry.

WEST on the gulf of Finland, about four miles from Peterhoff, flands the palace of Ranyboam, ftraight fouth from Cronftadt. The palace was in my time but very indifferent; but it had a pleafant profpect from the gulf, and a fine quay for finall veffels veffels and boats ; but as I faw nothing there worth notice, I fhall fay no more about it.

It is well known that the monarch is abfolute over the lives and fortunes of her fubjects. of whatever condition they are, tho' few examples can be given, at least in our days, of the perversion or abufe of that unlimited power. Individuals may fuffer innocently ; but that happens feldom, and commonly it proceeds from private piques, milireprelented by fome of the monarch's favourites : But generally, either in the prefent or preceeding reign, the offenders are punished most feverely; and the innocent, if alive, are not only re-inflated, but fhine with a diffinguished luftre. If they be dead, then their children, or nearest relations, fucceed to all their wealth, and often are favourites : This is extremely natural, as will be elucidated by feveral inftances in the following remarks,

Ancient families are very much refpected ; and whoever deferves well, will be ftill the more refpected on that account, even by the Emprefs herfelf. Except titles, I know really no natural difference betwixt their nobility and gentry, as they have equal powers ; and all honourable diffinctions arife from their different perfonal ranks in the Empire. The noblemen and gentlemen are lords over their peafants ; and may at pleafure punifh them with whip and confifcation, without giving any reafon to any perfon ; But they have have no power over their lives; and therefore if, by excels of punifhment, any of them thould happen to die, their lords muft even fatisfy juffice, by fubmitting to be hanged. The peafants, as hath been faid, are abfolute flaves to their lords ; and yet, tho' it may feem furprifing, they are fatisfied with their flavery. They commonly have good warm houses to live in : They have as much land as they can labour, and as much pasturage as they can ftore with cattle, without paying a farthing for it, They are obliged to work four days in fix for their lords, and have two days in the week for themfelves : But their lords often reap where they do not fow ; for when any of them appear to thrive and profper, and to rife above his neighbour, his lord and mafter foon reduces him to equality, by levying a loan from him, never to be paid. Their lords can transplant them when and where they pleafe, or fell them, either with or. without their lands, to any perfon : And frequently it happens that they buy themfelves ; that is, they get a good friend, or merchant, to buy them from their lord at a certain price, which the boor refunds, and then enters into the community of merchants. They take all care to promote matrimony early. They cannot force marriage by law, but if two be recommended, one to the other, by their lords or their factors, there is feldom any objection made ; nor is this to be wondered at, as the perfon, perfon, who declined the match, would afterwards live a most uneasy life.

I have known young women of 20 years of age married to a boy of nine or ten : The reafon given for this is, that the boy being a poor orphan, the girl is able, by her work, to maintain him till he is of years ; and if they had any cattle when married, they would probably increase to a good flock by the time he is major. If the woman proves with child, before it is thought natural for the hufband to be the father of it, ftill, as fhe has a hufband, no notice is taken of it; but probably the prieft may give her fome private penance. The ceremony of marriage and confummation is not fo ridiculous as it formerly was faid to have been. The bride does not prefent her bridegroom with the whip. The bride and bridegroom are married in prefence of their friends and relations at church ; thereafter they return home and make merry with their guefts ; and, at the ufual time of night, go to bed, when their friends leave them till next day. In fhort every thing is carried on with as great decorum and modefty as with us. And I never heard that the men treated their wives but with the greatest tenderness and affection. One great occafion why they are young married, is, that their children may be able, if neceffary, to fupport them in their old age. I am of opinion, there cannot be produced many examples in Ruffia, that children JUSE EL dren ever did or durft fuffer their parents to pine in want, whilst they themselves lived in plenty. One remarkable inftance, however, of the want of filial affection, I fhall here relate: A peafant, a common foldier in the guards, behaved himfelf fo well in many actions, fome of them under the eye of the Great Peter, that, notwithstanding his native obfcurity, and an entire ignorance of his parents, he was made captain of the guards, a rank equal to a lieutenant colonel in the field regiments. His father, a peafant, on the borders of Siberia, and in great want, got a paffport for St Petersburgh ; and hoping to be kept by his fon in ealy circumstances, fold off his poor pittance ; and after a fatiguing journey, at last arrived in that city. He foon learned where his fon lived, and afked the centinel at the gate, to get fome perfon to acquaint him, (who, at that time, had fome company at his house,) that his father longed to fee him. The foldiers, gathered together, fcoffed and derided the poor old man; for the captain had given himfelf out for a gentleman by birth. The noife made in the court. foon brought out the fervants, and at laft the captain and his company, to fee what was the matter. The captain ordered his old father to be beaten with rods, and turned out to the ftreet. This did not fail to affemble a multitude of people, amongst whom there happened to be a writer, who carried the old man man to a houfe, and, for a fmall confideration, drew out a petition, humbly reprefenting his cafe, and advised him to wait near the palace next day, at a certain place by which the Emperor ufually paffed, and then to hold up his petition to his Majefty. Next morning, as the Emperor paffed by in a two wheeled-chaife, attended only by a footman, and obferving the old man, heftopped, took his petition, read it inftantly, and commanded him to be on the parade next morning, at a cortain hour, telling him that the foldiers on duty fhould have orders not to moleft him. Every thing happened as the Emperor had ordered ; and at the old man prefenting himfelf to the Emperor, he ordered the guards to form a circle, and commanded the captain's prefence. He then afked the captain, Whether he was not born in fuch a village; and whether of fuch parentage? And commanded that on pain of death he fhould tell him the truth, for he was determined to know his birth. The captain, confidering that the Emperor would certainly difcover it, and that the confequence of diffembling and putting him to fo much trouble might not only be fatal, but probably provoke him to inflict a painful and ignominious death, fell at his feet, confeffed the whole, and afked pardon. Upon this, that wife and wonderful Prince called for his dubine, (this was an oak flick kept in a fcarlet cloath, and always carried bv K by a fervant) with which he used instantly to punish flight offences with his own hand. This dubine he delivered into the old man's hand, and commanded him to use it as a father ought to do to difobedient and ungrateful children. The old man paufed, and told the Emperor he could not firike his fon while he had on him the uniform of the guards. This was agreeable to the Emperor, who ordered the captain to put off thefe incumbrances, when the father chaftifed his unnatural fon with fuch wholefome fevericy, that the Emperor at laft defired him to fpare his captain, and ordered one half of his falary to be applied to the maintenance of the old man, and, with a firm tone, told the byflanders that what they had just now feen done was agreeable to the laws of God and the Empire, and that he was determined that thefe laws fhould, without regard to diffinction of office, or dignity of defcent, be put in execution against every one who durft tranfgress them. At the fame time, he acknowledged that the captain was a brave officer, and that if he continued to behave well, he would endeavour to forget his unnatural crime, and advance him in the army according to the regulations, and his merit.

Upon this, that wife and wonderful Prince

Institution of Companies of Merchants, &c.

PETER inftituted, in every one of his cities, companies of merchants, fubject only to burgomafters, bailies, or aldermen and their counfellors; but thefe people, formerly peafants, and raifed from that rank to pofts of power and honour, could not contain themfelves within the bounds of moderation; wherefore this regulation was difcontinued either in Peter's reign, or in that of fome of his fucceffors : But it was afterwards re-eftablifhed, as will appear in the courfe of this work.

From what hath been faid, it is eafy to fee a fine fystem of order and regularity in the Ruffian governments, but, being abfolute, the people are fometimes fubject to terrible oppressions, which, however, cannot be charged on the general plan, or the wife regulations of the great father of this vast empire, but on weak princes, and wicked ministers, who commonly pervert power, mission of the prince, and oppress the people.

The Ruffians, formerly favage, but now civilized, are a brave, and virtuous people, their manners mild, and their judges juft; nor are there in the world better officers and bolder men. Merit in Ruffia is the fure road to preferment, and none but men are admitted 76 admitted into posts of honour and confideration : Boys, or milk fops, however nobly born, have no chance in the army or navy, nor can family-influence prefer them.

In Ruffia nothing pleafed me more than their eafy and elegant civility and diferentian to ftrangers, a virtue this for which all ranks are remarkable. In Ruffia too, accefs to juffice is exceeding eafy and inexpensive, and it but rarely happens that the injured are not repaired.

Rudeness is scarce known in Russia, nor is this to be wondered at, as the Great Peter in one of his regulations expressly enjoins due deference to be paid to all degrees of men; hence every person lives in peace, in quiet and fecurity.

Britons juftly boaft of the Britifh conflitution, but it is a groß abuse of it to confider that of any other nation with contempt; a practice, however, which but too often occurs. The author, partial to his country, joins in general in its juft praise, but the gentle reader will, he humbly hopes, have him forgiven if he should here regret a grievous defect in our police, which deferves confideration.

I had a younger brother whom I brought up under my own eye, and who ferved in all the late wars in America and the Weft Indies, and bravely fell in driving off the enemy from a hill which covered the Moro caftle. caftle, which he effected with a finall number of his brave countrymen in the Royal. His colonel, a general officer, wrote a polite letter, now in my pofferlion, condoling with his aged parents, and has it in there memorable words : " I heartily condole with Lieutenant Cook's aged parents, they have had a great lofs in their fon, but the Royal has alfo received a very remarkable lofs of a brave gallant officer."

It was expected, and one should think, not without reafon, that Lieutenant Cook's heirs would have received fome finall fhare, or pittance of the booty got at the Havannah; but his friends were difappointed, though it is certain, he loft his life not by accident, or by acting improperly, but in bravely and exactly obeying the orders of his fuperiors. Indeed, if he had furvived the taking of that city, his proportion of the booty would not have been a premium, as every one knows that the diffribution of it was remarkbly partial and unequal, repugnant to every just and proper regulation. Gentlemen, who are intrusted with a command, deferve, no doubt, the first diffinction in dignity and emolument ; but it will be hard to find a police or political arithmetic, fufficient to warrant a scheme of division, by which one or two got all, and 20,000 men got in a manner, nothing. A police fo partial and improper, fhould, with fubmiffion, be amended; for for however officers, unwilling to diffurb the public peace, may find it convenient to connive at fuch an oeconomy, it has a natural tendency to reprefs ardour, and extinguish emulation; and therefore though gentlemen will ever do their duty, yet great efforts cannot be expected, nor glorious exploits be performed,

What happened at Petershoff, and elfewhere.

H AVING made fome general remarks upon the government, religion, and policy of Ruffia, I fhall relate particulars as they occur in the courfe of my travels. Next morning after I arrived in St Peterfburgh, I went to the Medicine Chancery with my landlord, and produced the letter from Cronftadt to the Archiator. The fecretary received it, but told me that the Archiator was at Peterhoff, and was not expected till the Court returned, which was very uncertain: But advifed me to go and wait on him there.

Accordingly, having hired horfes, I next day fet out with a Ruffian, with whom I could have no conversation. When we arrived, I difinified my Ruffian, and walked towards the palace into the garden on the fouth, where I faw the guards encamped on the banks of a beautiful canal, with their officers ficers fuperb tents next the palace. I fpoke to many people, but I was underflood by none. I walked till I was quite tired and well appetifed, when I left this pleafant garden, not knowing where to go, nor to whom to apply. At laft, it was my good fortune to fpeak to a German, a butler, very well dreffed. He told me that he had been in England, alked me When I arrived? with many other queftions; and very civilly defired I would go to his lodgings and accept of a collation. I was no way averse to that, and indeed he gave me plenty of meats, exceedingly well dreffed, and as much Burgundy as I cared for, and rather more. He told me that he had no acquaintance of the Archiator, but that a furgeon to her Majefty, a countryman of mine, would be at Peterfhoff next day, and that I fhould be very welcome to a bed in his lodgings, as I would be very ill accommodated in the neighbouring village.

He favoured me with the knowledge of many things, and expressed his furprize that I had walked in the garden covered, without being affronted. He assured me that none were allowed to pass by the Empress's windows, but with their hats under their arms, and therefore imagined that the Empress had probably seen me, and given charge not to moless me in the second to the second to the second observed many chevaliers in their orders, and others others walking as he defcribed them, but I looked upon them as fine gentlemen of rank and fortune just amufing themfelves.

For all his kindnefs I returned him my unfeigned thanks, and begged him to accept of fome money for my good entertainment. At this he finiling faid, that he fold nothing; and that none who had the honour to ferve the Emprefs durft take any thing for any little civility they might have in their power to fhew to ftrangers.

I then told him that I wanted to go for Cronftadt, and that I would return next morning if I could get a boat. He immediately went with me through the north garden to a key opening into the frith, and got me a place in a ten oared barge, in company with two gentlemen, with whom he fpoke,

We immediately put off, and foon reached our port: The failors rowed extremely well; I underftood they belonged to Admiral Gordon. I attempted to fpeak with the gentlemen, but we could not underftand one another, as they underftood neither Latin nor Englifh. They were, however, extremely polite, offering me a piece of fuggared mufkmelon, very delicious, and alfo a fhare of their wine.

Next morning early, I hired a boat and went for Ranyboam: That palace is four or five miles fouth from Cronftadt, a most agreeable fituation. From the windows, one has has a view of Cronftadt city, with all the fhipping, and a very extensive fheet of water in the gulf of Finland. From this I walked to Petershoff being only three or four miles distant. Peter the Great took much delight in Ranyboam, and, if he had lived longer, would have made it more beautiful than even Petershoff. It was in Ranyboam, Peter the third was feized by his barbarous and traiterous fubjects.

A Continuation of what happened at Petershoff.

A T my arrival I went to Mr Lewis Calder-A wood's lodgings, one of the household furgeons who had come from St Peterfburgh to change with another furgeon, a German called Menzies. After I had acquainted him with my bufinefs, we breakfasted together, and he immediately introduced me to the Archiator, one Dr Fisher a Livonian. It was eafy to fee that he affumed great flate, and Mr Calderwood advised me to give him the title of Excellence, which I did not forget. He fpoke in Latin very elegantly, and after having afked me a great number of queftions, he advised me to teach furgery, telling me that though my education that way might be very good, yet he could not think my expeperience L perience could be great, confidering my youth; and in fhort that he would grant me a good falary and horfe, fervants, and firewood.

I returned him my moft refpectful acknowledgments for the care he expressed for me, and candidly confeffed that though my experience could not be called extensive, I had yet made as good use of my time as was in my power, and that I was ready to perform any piece of furgery, which he fhould appoint. I told him, that a long and lingering difeafe had reduced me to what he faw, and which might caufe him think me younger than I really was. But I affured him that though I had come to Ruffia to have the honour to ferve the Emprefs, and was ready to go any where, vet I was determined never to commence schoolmaster, for two principal reasons; the first was that a fedentary life would never give me the finalleft chance of recovering my loft health; and the next was, that I had a natural averfion from that way of life, and never could bring myfelf to fubmit to the drudgery of it.

At this he finiled, fpoke fomewhat to Mr Calderwood in the German language, and faid to me that he would immediately order my examination, and that when he fhould arrive in St Peterfburgh, which would be in a few days, we fhould talk more about it. We then retired; I dined with Meffrs Calderwood wood and Menzies, and returned the fame day to St Peterfburgh with Mr Menzies, who, on the road favoured me with many a fine advice how I fhould behave.

He told me, under fecrecy, never to en gage but by contract, nor to fign any papers till fome of my countrymen had explained their contents. He faid that people fpoke but little there, and that a word to the wife was fufficient. In two or three days thereafter I was brought to my examination before nine gentlemen, but only two of them could fpeak Latin; however one of them interpreted to the reft, and from them to me. Having finifhed it, they told me that they had little to fay against my qualifications but that as I feemed very young they could not think my experience could be great. They examined me on anatomy, furgery, medicine and pharmacy. They proposed fundry difeases and caufed me write fuch medicines, &c. as I thought fit for fuch complaints, and very politely difinified me after they had kept me about three hours : However they gave me a few glasses of wine, and allowed, nay entreated me to fit down. My landlord, who was very obliging, told me that the examiners were very well pleafed with my anfwers.

At the Archiator's arrival, I was fent for, he told me that it would be very agreeable to him if I would engage only for two or three years to teach furgery. This I abfolutely refufed. fufed, and infifted on ferving one year at leaft in St Peterfburgh, either in the fleet or in the hofpitals; he faid that could not be granted, becaufe he had already engaged five more than the ordinary number in the fleet, that the hofpitals were over complement, but that, rather than I fhould return, he would fend me to a good garrifon, or to one of the armies then acting againft the Turks, which I declined, took my leave, and refolved to return home.

I IMMEDIATELY applied to Mr Rown-dox the British Refident for a paffport, who fent a memorial by me to the college of foreign affairs. They told me to make my appearance to-morrow, and every day after that, I got the fame anfwer, and this continued till I went to Mr Bell of Antermony, told him that the British shipping were all going home, and I must be left, if I could not get home directly, in which cafe I fhould be obliged to fubmit to any agreement they might think proper. That truly worthy gentleman went with me; and expoftulated with them to effectually, that they told him they were forbid granting a paffport by a Doltra memorial memorial from the Medicine Chancery. Upon this, Mr Bell procured a politive meffage from Mr Rowndox to the chancery, in which, as I was informed, amongft other things, he faid that if the Chancery offered to ftop my returning home, on the morrow he was to wait upon the Empress, and would not fail to lay the affair before her Majefty. This had the effect; the Chancery was fo uneafy at fuch a refolute declaration, that they fent for me by the time I got to my lodging, and granted my demands the 30th day of September.

The Archiator told me that he would have a care of me, and be as a parent, providing I did not neglect my bufinefs, but acted according to the regulations. I bowed before him, but humbly obferved that it could not be expected I could, as if I was infpired, know the regulations; becaufe I was not only a ftranger, but could neither read nor fpeak their language: At this he laughed, and faid all that he meant by regulations at prefent, was only to attend the hofpital, where I was going to be fettled, twice every day; and in difficult cafes to afk the advice of the phyficians and furgeons.

This I ackowledged was most reasonable, and I affured him that I would pledge my life for the faithful performance of it.

He faid he had fent orders to the fupreme furgeon in the fea-hofpital to caufe a lodging

WAITED upon the fupreme furgeon of the fea-hofpital Mr Engbrodt a Swedish prifoner, in company with Mr Selkirk furgeon to the guards. Mr Engbrodt, received me very politely, and told us that he had got orders about me, he faid that I might board myfelf at the gardener's, where all the gentlemen batchelors in both hofpitals were provided with dinner and fupper, and that I fhould always be welcome to his table, when it was convenient for me. He advifed me to be fure to make my repair to the hofpital precifely at the end of the month; becaufe, whatever inclination he might have to befriend me, it would not be in his power ; because he was obliged to make out regular reports and fend them to the Chancery once. at leaft, every week; that though the Archiator might overlook it, yet it could add nothing to my character to begin my fervice with neglect of duty. I answered him, that I did

I did not intend to take half the time the Archiator had been gracioufly pleafed to grant me, and therefore defired he would give orders to have my lodgings foon put in order. I then took my leave, and in eight or ten days thereafter, entered upon my employ. In juffice to the gentlemen in both hofpitals, I muft here confefs that from them I received many and fignal civilities.

I was alfo allowed a young gentleman, Mr Rofen, who fpoke Latin well, to go with me as my interpreter when I vifited the fick. I clofely attended the anatomical preparations, and, when the work amongft my patients was over, I fcarcely was ever out of the diffecting chamber. I had not followed bufinefs above a fortnight when Mr Hanhaft profeffor of anatomy, a Swifs, who had ever fhewed me great friendfhip, and one of the beft anatomifts in Europe, came to my chamber, and begged of me as a mighty favour, that I would prepare the leffon for next day, in regard he had fome bufinefs of much importance to tranfact that day in the city.

I anfwered that few things could give me greater pleafure than to ferve him, from whom I had received fo many marks of friendfhip; that I was truly proud of his thinking me fit for fuch employment; and that it would be most agreeable to me, if he would frequently honour me with it. He gave me the leffon, which I got ready long before before night. Next day I was prefent when the cadaver was brought into the theatre. Mr Hanhaft viewed my work very carefully," and, as I was told by Mr Rofen, faid a great deal in my favour. At the end of his difcourfe he afked me, If I was willing to prepare the leffons with or without his affiftance as occafion might require ? I anfwered, nothing could give me greater pleafure : Whereupon he read an order to the gentlemen in the hofpital, letting them know that I was difcharged from all business in the hospital, except when I chufed to help, and that I was appointed by the Medicine Chancery folely to prepare the leffons: But I never neglected vifiting the fick, though I was appointed to no particular ward, by this means I had it in my option to vifit all the wards, without being a flave to any. Soon after this, the Archiator arrived to vifit the hofpitals, he fent for me, and faid that he was well pleafed with me, and would not forget to do for me better, I returned him thanks for what he had done, and retired. When he was gone, the professor told me that the Archiator's fon was to fludy anatomy in our hospital, advised me to make fome preparations for him, and when he fhould be in the diffecting chamber that I fhould fhew him any part he defired to be informed of. I took this in very good part, and immediately fet to work, injected and prepared an eye with all its mufcles, arteries, teries, veins and nerves, alfo a heart, and varnished them : I got the simall bones of the ear joined together in their natural situation within the cavity, carefully fawn as a different times I presented him with these factitious affairs.

He frequently invited me to visit him, but I always excufed myfelf. Thus I lived much to my own fatisfaction till March 15th 1737, when I very unexpectedly got orders to repair to the galley-haven and attend the fick in that place; becaufe one furgeon was dead, and the other fo far gone in a confumption that he could do but little fervice. Mr Hanhart expressed rather a greater diffatisfaction than I did: He told me that he intended to go to Leyden for one year, and take out his degrees as phyfician: For which he undoubtedly was well qualified. That he had told the Archiator of this long ago, and that he had recommended me to fupply his place: With all which, the Archiator feemed very well pleafed. He faid, that he did not altogether despair but this might happen; because he was certain the Chancery fcarcely knew what to do for qualified furgeons, as there was a daily lofs of them in the armies. He faid, that he hoped that was the Archiator's intention, becaufe I was fent to no diftance, and to be in a fixed place.

With regret I left this hofpital, and the fame day made my appearance at the galley-M haven 90 haven to the refiding commander in chief, who was a Greek, and, what is far better, a good man. He was about 60 years of age : I was much taken with him, and he daily invited me to his house. He was very fober and difcreet, had only one daughter, a pretty lady about 17, and the was as complaifant as her father, who doated on her. I was fo well received by this good old man that I had very near forgot the hofpital, and indeed I lived in good friendship with all the inferior officers. I was appointed a boat with four oars to use as I pleased. Many officers and our general lived in the city, but it was my duty to go at leaft once a week to vifit. our fick in the general fea-hofpital : For 'although there was a finall hofpital in the galley-haven, yet, by the regulations, I was ordered to fend all patients, whofe difeafes would take a long time to cure to St Peterf. burgh. Our hofpital was confidered only as a place prepared for fudden ailments and accidents.

Next day I waited upon our general, an old man, and a Rufs, whofe name was Ivan Golovine. He received me very well. His adjutant defired I would take a glafs of wine with him in his apartment, to which I agreed, and he told me that our commander was a man of no merit, and remarkably obflinate. He day made my appearant

TRAVELS.

He faid that he was indeed of a good family, and that was his only qualification; for there was not a fingle action that he ever did, or indeed could do, for the good of the Empire, and he was befides altogether illiterate.

This adjutant was a German, and a good fcholar. He told me that Peter the Great fent for our general when he was young, and having been told of his character, defired him to live in the palace, or ferve in his armies or fleet. The anfwer he gave to the Emperor was, that he wifhed he would know him no better than the late Emperor his father knew his Golovine's father. At this time it pleafed the Emperor, and he wanted fuch people about him who without fear or flattery, would tell him what they knew.

Peter the Great appointed him an officer in the galleys, which he never commanded in perfon, and foon afterwards advanced him to the rank of general, but kept him conftantly about his perfon. He faid, at Karitzin when the Emperor was going to profecute his war in Perfia, this general was miffing two or three days, nor could the Emperor get notice where he was; but as he was much given to drink, fuppofed he might be in fome common houfe. The Emperor to find out where he was, and alfo to punifh his pride, caufed the drums to beat through the city, and at certain places, caufed the criter crier to make known to the inhabitants, that the general of the galleys was loft; and therefore ordered that whoever knew of him, fhould immediately make difcovery, without lofs of time, offering a reward to the difcoverer of three farthings, but threatening punifhment to any who fhould dare to conceal him.

This had the effect : It roufed him : He inftantly deferted his drunken companions, went to the Emperor, and expoftulated with him about affronting in fo public a manner an officer of his rank, threatening at the fame time that he would be revenged.

This pleafed the Emperor, for he kept him by way of a buffoon, and confequently allowed him all liberty of fpeech. The Emperor ufed to take an hour's fleep after dinner which is the cuftom in these countries : He loved the fleet as is well known to excess.

A fleet of finall veffels at that time lay at Tzaritz and, while he was fleeping in one of them, Golovine ordered all the bells in the city to be rung, and at the fame time to make an alarm with all the drums; which in Ruffia, is a certain fign of fomething extraordinary.

The Emperor diffurbed out of his fleep, made enquiry at the officers on board concerning the caufe of this alarm. They all faw there was no fire in the city, but could not conceive what was the matter; wherefore the Emperor went to the commandant mandant to enquire. He knew as little of the caufe as his Majefty, but faid that the general of the galleys had given fuch orders: All fearch was made for him, but he was not to be found.

At laft Golovine, who perfectly knew the Emperor's way, flayed fo long till he thought the Emperor would be pleafed to fee him again, he was only hid in an old cafk which was in the houfe where the Emperor refided when in town. He told the Emperor that was the revenge he took for the affront he had given him.

The Emperor's anger being over, Golovine got off, but was ferioufly advifed never more to adventure on fuch daring actions, left he might fuffer the lofs of his head, Many fuch flories were told of him, but this is fufficient to fhew that the man was admired only for his folly and impertinence.

The Empress Anne took pleasure in plaguing him, and the more rude he expressed himself to her, she liked him the better, however the greatest lord durft not affront him; for, though he could do little or no good, he was yet able to do, and had done, much harm:

The galley-haven is truly a pleafant fortrefs: It is fituated on the weft end of Vafilie Oftroff on the eaft end of the gulph of Finland, and communicates with St Peterfburgh with a profpective cut through the woods. I was told there were 200 galleys kept here, and and I believe there are not many fewer. I have frequently feen them, though I never numbered them. They are drawn out of the water and kept under fhades in the winter, but they are eafily launched, when needful. The garrifon keeps a good look-out, and will permit none to enter without orders from the main-guard, though men of diffunction, and acquainted with all the officers.

The Author receives orders to march. Great conflagrations in St Petersburgh, and the eriminals punished.

NE day Mr Farcharfon Professor of Aftronomy came from the Academy to drink tea with me, but, although all the younger officers had fludied under him, and particularly the gentlemen at that time on guard, whom he well knew, he could not get admittance till the commander gave orders. Indeed the Captain ran to the gate, and conducted his old regent with great deference to my houfe. When feated, the good old professor told him, that he was glad to have lived to long as to fee many gentlemen in the fleet, formerly his pupils, of diffinguished learning, who could prefcribe laws to him. Compliments on both fides were not wanting. I fpent my time in this pleafant place. and

and amongst agreeable company, only till the beginning of August, when one morning I was furprized with an order from the Medicine Chancery for me to attend the admiralty, and get ready to march to a village on the river Don called Cotcholoff, distant about 30 or 40 miles from Afoph, which now was in posseful of the Russian army.

I acknowledge it furprifed me not a little, yet after reflection I found that I had no reafon to complain, fince I had lived in St Peterfburgh one year. But, before I enter upon my travels, I again muft fay I never had fpent a year fo pleafantly as at this place, nor did I ever meet with any thing incommodious during that whole time, nor any thing which could give uncafine is to any of my agreeable neighbours, except two very terrible conflagrations in the city of St Peterfburgh.

The first happened in May or June, and burnt down many fine palaces, befides her Majesty's great dispensary, and the Medicine Chancery in that street called the Milion. The other burnt down fome hundreds of houses, mostly indeed of timber, in that part of the city called the Little Morskoy.

Here I was prefent, and happened to ftand by the fide of a canal near a great brick house belonging to a prince, all in flames. The roof was fallen in, and few of the byftanders were taking any notice of it, when it fuddenly 96 denly blew up with fuch a fhock as made the earth tremble where we ftood.

The day was ferene, little wind, but very hot, but in an inftant we were all covered with fo thick a finoke, that the fun could not be feen for fome time: In a minute however, after the blaft, or lefs time, many chairs, tables, and other pieces of furniture, fome of them half burnt, fell from the air into the canal adjoining, without hurting any one perfon. It was indeed fortunate that none of them fell on the other fide of the canal where were very large and coftly magazines of hemp, ropes, cables, pitch, tar, & belonging to the Empress, for had the fire reached that magazine, all the English merchants houses and the Admiralty would have been deftroyed.

It was found out that the fire was fet to the houses in different ftreets at once, fo that the poor inhabitants could fcarcely fave any thing, and before any help could come, the whole Morfkoy was in flames. Three incendiaries were taken, two men and a woman, thefe I faw executed a few days thereafter, in the ruins of the Morfkoy. The men were each chained to the top of a large maß fixed in the ground ; they flood upon finall fcaffolds and many thoufand billets of wood were built from the ground, fo as to form a pyramid round each maft. These pyramids were fo high as to reach within two or three fathoms of the little ftages on which the men ftood ftood in their fhirts, and their drawers. They were condemned in this manner to be burnt to powder : But before the pyramids were fet on fire, the woman was brought betwixt thefe mafts, and a declaration of their villany, and the order for their execution, read. The men called out loudly, that, though they were guilty, yet the woman was innocent, however the woman's head was chopped off. For they never expose the perfons of women, either by hanging or burning, let their crime be what it will. Poffibly had the Empress Anne been at Petersburgh, the woman would have been pardoned; it was faid however, that the proof was very clear, and that the woman knew, that the villains were determined to commit this horrid crime, fome days before it happened.

No fooner was the woman's head chopped off, than a link was put to the wooden pyramids, and as the timber was very dry, it formed in an inftant a very terrible fire: The men would foon have died had not the wind frequently blown the flames from them; however, they both expired in lefs than three quarters of an hour, in great torment.

An accident happened at this execution, which amufed many people. Immediately after the men were dead, a young airy writer, very neatly dreffed, was running through the ruins, in order to fee the execution: The whole ground was coverd with the charcoal from the late conflagration, fo that none were fafe to go any where but on the paved ftreets : As the Ruffians are obliged to keep their ftreets and houfes fweet and clean: Every house has conveniences for that purpole, and the poor writer, gazing at the criminals, as he haftened towards the place of execution, plumped into one of thefe above the middle. Many of the guards, and others, not fatisfied with fcoffing and laughing at the unfortunate writer, threw into the filth pieces of burnt wood, bricks and ftones, with a view to fplash him all over. Such treatment sharpened the ingenuity of the distressed writer, and fired his refentment to the higheft pitch.

As they were very near him, he threw plenty of the fetid ftuff about him, bedaubed many, and forced them to retreat to a greater diftance, by which means he got out without great interruption, but his rage was fo great, that inftead of going home, he run amongft the guards, who he imagined were the caufe of the ludricous condition he was exposed to. Many of them he bedaubed, well knowing they would not efcape punifhment for having their cloaths fo damaged: Indeed I believe the Ruffian guards were never put to fuch a fhameful flight.

MANY very entertaining and magnificent fireworks were exhibited on the river Neva, and grand illuminations for the fuccefs of the Ruffian arms against the Turks, fo expensive and grand that many people skilled in fuch works, faid that they did not believe the like had ever been feen in any part of Europe: The rockets were terrible. The charge of each large one was faid to weigh an extraordinary weight, and when they had rifen, to an immense height in the air, they burft with an explosion equal to that of a large cannon, and exhibited many fire balls, of various colours, falling down to the earth: A great variety of wheels, and many other things whole names I am unacquainted with, were played off, fo that in midnight, one might have feen as clearly as in mid-day. The grand illuminations were placed on a large timber building of two flories high, and a great length, crected on the north fide of the river opposite the winter palace. The lamps exhibited flames of different colours, reprefenting the last city or fortification taken from the Turks, fuch as Aloph, Perecop, Kinburn.

burn, Kinbam, &c. Before the fire works were played off, there was erected upon the river a large tall maft, on which was hung a white fheet of cloath, as broad as the fail of the largeft fhip of war, but longer, fire was put to this as the fignal for beginning : The flame ran up the fheet inftantly like a flash of lightening, but left upon it the figure of the city, for the honour of which the works were to be played off, in a deep and gloffy fire which continued ten or twelve minutes, before the fheet was deftroyed. Whilft the fpectators were observing this figure, all the lamps were expeditioufly lighted, which, as was faid, exhibited the fame figure, but in a much more extensive space, and these continued burning the whole time, and even longer than the fireworks lafted. As the timber galleries were upwards of two hundred foot long, the regularity and difpatch in performing these wonderful works no doubt furprised me, and they had much the fame effect upon people more acquainted with them.

As I was a ftranger, and neither underflood the manner nor language of the people, I laid down a plan of behaviour, which was to remark the ordinary cuftoms of the people, and to ufe all the gentle ways in my power to make them underfland me. I meant no ill, and never to fhew anger or refentment, but with a refolution to put my threats in as compleat execution as I was able, and to go as little out in in the night time as I could, which I doubt not was the caufe of my efcaping many troubles and affronts at first.

I fhall make two or three remarks of what happened to me during my ftay at St Peterfburgh. I went into the great fquare before the fummer palace to fee the first regiment of guards exercised called Preprofensky, confisting of betwixt five and 600 men. I walked towards a canal which furrounds the palace and gardens, in order to get behind the guards, and get out of the croud.

. Looking up the canal, I efpied on the opposite fide a magnificently rich tent, the first time I faw the Empress, accompanied with a great number of ladies and gentlemen. It was eafy to know her by the refpectful diftance the ladies and gentlemen kept ; the gentlemen were all uncovered, I thought it could not be taken ill, if I went a little nigher to get a view of the Empress and court, but walked very cautioufly with my hat under my arm. A lord called out and made a motion with his hand towards me, and thinking I had tranfgreffed, was going off, but with my eyes fixed on the Court, when I obferved the Empress turn, and heard her speak; at which, the fame perfon moved down the fide of the canal nearer to me, and fpoke, made motions, as I thought fignifying that I fhould come nearer to where the Court was. At first, I dared not, but by the many motions

tions he made, I ventured forward, though flowly, and had the fatisfaction to fee one of the grandeft courts in the world. The Empress Anne was no beauty, but had fomething fo graceful and full of majefty, that it had a ftrange effect upon me; I, at the fame time, both feared and revered her. The men were in the richeft drefs, and alfo the ladies, amongft whom were many very exquisite beauties : However I ftole away, as imperceptibly and fuddenly as I could.

The Princeffes Elizabeth and Anne made very fine appearances and were both very beautiful.

At another time, I was invited to dine at Mr Selkirk's, who lived on the north fide of the river, opposite the fummer palace. I went to the common ferry, which I had upon former occasions paffed many times : A great number of people went into a boat, which I fuppofed was to crofs the river, but, to my difappointment, carried me up the Neva to the eaft of the palace, where I had never been : I payed my fare, went afhore, and as I could not get to the other fide, wandered about feeking my way to the city; but met with difficulties from canals, high walls, and blind flreets. At laft, quite fatigued. I faw a gate open into a garden, and fine gravel walks, which afterwards I was informed was a garden and fummer-house belonging to the Empress : Two granadiers ftood

TRAVELS.

ftood centinels at that gate, who would not fuffer me to enter: I then returned to the ftairs where I had landed, expecting when a boat fhould put off. The Ruffians are the most dextrous at finding out, and relieving the want of ftrangers, of any people, I believe, in the world. I had not ftood long, when a waterman came and fpoke to me, but I not knowing what he faid, pointed to the other fide, and shewed him a handful of copper money: He pointed to his boat, took me by the hand, and carried me to the port I defired, nor would he take fo much money as I thought he deferved; for they dare take no more than their fare.

Another time after the froft had begun, I was walking under the fhade at the great market-place, wanting to buy fomewhat. At once, a Ruffian merchant took hold of me by the arm, faying fomething : He took a handful of fnow, and was going to apply it to my face, when I twifted myfelf from him, but by a certain gentlenefs in his deportment, and anxiety in his countenance, I fubmitted, and he again feized me and rubbed one of my cheeks with fnow till it glowed. I did not well know what to make of it, but was told at my return home, that my cheek was frofted, and that the Ruffians never obferve that in any perfon, but they immediately rub the part well with fnow, which indeed I have fince fince experienced to be a fafe and certain cure.

When I lived at the galley-haven, it was my duty daily to go and vifit the fick officers who lived in the city, and fometimes it was late before I could return. I had been warned to take care not to go on the Profpective; becaufe many people had been robbed and murdered there in the night time, I therefore generally went through a private road in the woods at a diffance from the Profpective, A gentleman, lieutenant in the fleet, Mr Alexander Gordon having had fome bufinefs in St Peterfburgh, and having a de fire to take his bed in my houfe, lived with me fome weeks.

One night we were late together in the city, and proposed to go home through the Prospective, especially as the night was not very dark. We had come near the end of the avenue, when four men rushed from the woods towards us: We both, resolute enough, drew our fwords and were determined neither to give nor receive quarters. The rogues observing that it would hazard their lives and a detection, fuddenly retired again into the woods, leaving us a free passage into the galley-haven.

I was obliged to attend the admiralty in order to get my difpatches and money for the journey, and horfes. Thus I had attended daily for three or four weeks, and every time time applied to a fecretary called Newleboff. a great rogue: His answer every time he faw me was, Zaftra, that is to fay, to-morrow : not knowing the meaning of this, and that I might be blameable for not applying to others, I complained to one Gordon a fecretary, and translator for the British, also by the admiralty.

He declined meddling in this affair, as he was afraid of getting ill-will from the Ruffian fecretaries; but told me, that, notwithstanding bribes were on pain of death, forbidden to be either offered or received, yet that fecretary would fcarcely do any thing, unlefs forced, or without fome acknowledgment. He was of opinion, I flould go to the admiralty daily, and make figns to any gentleman I might fee, and fay what he had taught me. I no fooner had got my leffon, but I went, and it was my fortune to fee the principal fecretary, to whom I addreffed myfelf in my jargon. Whilft I was endeavouring to make him conceive what I meant, a gentleman came from the board to fpeak with this fecretary; neither of them could understand me; but this gentleman, who I afterwards learnt was procurator, took me by the hand, and led me to the board. An admiral, called Mushiacoff, spoke to me in good English.

This gentleman had been long in England, and had frequently fhewn much favour to Britifh fubjects : To him I laid open the whole truth :

truth : He defired me to wait a little ; and gave orders in the Ruís language. Soon thereafter, Nelewboff appeared, when he obferved I was there, he changed colours, and no doubt faid fomewhat for his excufe, whilft he was fpeaking, he frequently looked to me, and put on an angry and difdainful countenance. I imagined he was accufing me, and knowing it must be falfe, faid in Ruís, "Te chudoi cheloveck," which fignifies that he was a very bad man. I did not know that I had exceeded in faying fo to an officer, but the Lords of the Admiralty fell into an exceeding fit of laughing, and without more ado gave him orders.

Admiral Mufhiacoff defired me to go with him, and told me he hoped there would be no more delay, but if there was, he ordered me to wait on the admiralty next day. Accordingly we went out together; when we came to the outer room where the principal fecretary and writers were, at the fight of us they fell into an immoderate fit of laughter at Nelewboff and me, which feemed much to difturb him, and going through the admiralty yard, he ftopped, fpoke in paffion, and threatened, at which I clapped my hand on my fword and wanted to return; on this he changed his tone, talked calmly, and in the most abject manner took me by the hand, led me to his apartment, fent for Gordon, and begged all animofity might be laid afide, affuring me that things could not be furnished that day, but next morning they should be ready.

For once he kept his word, and I was difpatched without any further trouble. The admiralty, without my defire, alfo ordered an old marine, who could fpeak a mediey of Englifh and Hollands, which I had no difficulty to underftand, to convoy me; this old foldier had been through that country in Peter the Great's time.

Before I leave this city, I imagine it will be agreeable to give fome account of the money, weights and meafures. The coin confifts of ducats of gold, rubles, half rubles, or poltines, quarter rubles, or chetwerte rubleoff, griveners or ten copeaks, and copeaks of filver, five copeaks, two copeaks, half copeaks or dinifhkas, and quarter copeaks or polufhka of copper.

A Rufs ducat is worth two rubles. A ruble is in our money much about four fhillings and fixpence, the denominations of half and quarter ruble express their value; a grivener is the value of the tenth part of a ruble, as a copeak is the hundreth part. They also count by altines, which is at prefent no coin. An altine contains three copeaks. I never faw an account which mentions ducats. The highest denominations of money in their accounts are express by a fum of rubles.

Ruffian

Ruffian weights confift of zolotnicks, lotes, funts or pounds, poods and berkewitz. A zolotnick weighs two penny-weight 17 grains I fourth Englifh. Three zolotnicks make a lote; 32 lotes make a pound. The Rufs pound is exactly apothecary weight; forty pounds make a pood; ten poods make a berkwitz, and 63 poods make a tun.

Liquid measure confifts of crufkas, vedros, ftakans, anchors and hogs. Eight crufkas make a vedro, one and a half vedro make a ftakan, two ftakans make an anchor, fix anchors make an hog, or, according to our language, hogfhead, which fignifies the fame thing, and is the fame measure.

Dry measure confifts of vocemiks, chetvericks and chetworths : One chetverick contains four vocemicks, and one chetworth contains eight chetvericks, equal to 24 pecks, or fix bushels English.

Concerning Russian Measures of Extension.

HEIR measure of extension is thus divided and denominated; verfchock, archine, 28 inches, fazen, verst: An archine contains 16 equal parts, called verfchocks, a fazen contains three archines, and a verst is measured by 500 fazens. As seven feet feet English are nearly equal to a fazen, a verst is equal to 3500 feet, or 1140 ells English; one degree contains about 104 versts, according to the measure of Picardy. In my travels through Russia, I shall confine my measure to versts, except in defarts not meafured, which are calculated only by hours, and this way of measuring is not very uncertain, providing you travel with the same horses, and at an equal pace,

The Author leaves St Petersburgh. Account of the Eams.

ON the 8th of September 1737, I left St Peterfburgh, and at four o'clock P. M. arrived at a village called Eamfkoi. It is a fuburb to the city, where travellers get horfes, and all villages in Ruffia, which by the law are obliged to keep horfes, are called Eams. Thefe villages have a grant of fo much land as is fufficient for their maintenance, and are therefore obliged to keep a number of horfes, particularly for the ufe of the army or fleet, and are fatisfied to take finall wages for thefe in the fervice of the Empire.

Every Eam has proper officers appointed to fee that difpatch be regularly given. They have also a cantoin in St Petersburgh who fuperintends perintends all affairs belonging to thefe Eams; and takes care that gentlemen from the army or fleet do not diffrefs them. But if it happen, that, upon any pretence, delay fhould be made in inftantly getting the horfes ready, the exprefs, whether officer or common centinel, has a power to bring them to reafon with a whip, not fparing their ftarofts or fuperiors.

A remarkable inftance of this kind happened at the time of my first setting out : A ferjeant was difpatched from the army to the cabinet; he rode day and night till he arrived at St Petersburgh. The Empress ordered him into her presence, to enquire particularly about the army, and obferving the mark of a ftroke upon his face, was pleafed to afk the caufe. He faid, That the post-boy or eamfhick, not riding fast enough, he therefore whipped his horfe, and the boy gave him a stroke over the face. Upon this the postboy was taken under arreft, and a certain number of eamfhicks, or those post-people, were fummoned to attend on a fixed day at St Peterfburgh, from all the Eams betwixt Molcow and Peterfburgh.

On the appointed day, the faid poft-boy was hanged, and an imperial decree fent through Ruflia, fetting forth the crime and execution; and further declaring, that none, of what condition foever, fhould, upon any pretence whatever, moleft, ftop, or hinder any courier difpatched from the army or fleet.

to St Peterfburgh, or from the fupreme cabinet to any province or city through the Empire; and that if eamfhicks fhould in any manner hinder or ftop any express employed in the affairs of the Empire, fuch delinquents fhall fuffer death.

Here two obfervations occur, with which I fhall clofe this chapter. First, The absolute nature of the Russian government; and next, The ready fervice that is given to its couriers, or dispatches, from one end to the other of that vast Empire, than which nothing can more advantage the affairs of state, especially in times of war, and on other important emergencies.

What happened to the Author in his way to Moscow.

A T this village 300 failors were ready to march with their proper officers early next morning for Afoph. As I knew not any of them, I thought proper, with my old foldier, and two carriages, to proceed fifteen verfts further, where there is a fmall village, and where a guard is kept to examine every one's paffports. In this village I lodged, and proceeded on my journey early next morning; but had not travelled far, till I was overtaken vertaken by the above-mentioned body of failors, driving in carts like Jehu. One horfe and cart were allotted for three failors. They foon passed me: However, I happened to dine at the fame village where they were. As my foldier could fpeak broken English, I went to their commander, acquainted him what I was, where I was going, and begged he would take me along with him, and order horfes to be got ready for me with those belonging to his command, for which I fhould readily pay my proportion. This he not only granted, but let the whole command know my profession, that they might respect me as an officer belonging to themfelves, and fhew me all civilities.

At the fame time, he introduced a boatfwain, an Englishman, of whose company, though not very refined, I was truly glad. We marched from this village till we arrived, without any accident, at the Priftan upon the banks of the river Volehoff, through a very woody country, but good roads and many villages, all the houfes of which were built of wood, and the ftreets laid with the fame materials. Every house of any confequence has a great gate, which opens into a large fquare covered deep with clean fraw, and built on every fide with wooden walls and timber fhades, which prevent rain from falling upon cattle or carriages; for they have no other stable. I imagine it is a good eafy contrivance, vance, and better for horfes than our ftables, and although the froft is exquifitely intenfe in that country, yet their cattle have no other ftable, nor have I ever heard that the cold hurts them, and they feed well.

The diffance betwixt St Peterfburgh and Priffan is 115 verfts: When we arrived there, the captain told me, That he was obliged to hire barks to carry his men to Novogorod, and that if I would go by water, I fhould have a cabbin granted to Mr Rannie and me, for this was the boatfwain's name. I accepted of his offer, and was transported up the river to Novogorod, diffant 67 verfts from Priftan. I paid one copeak per verft for one horfe, from St Peterfburgh to Priffan, from Priffan to Moscow, and thence to Cotchalore, at the rate of fix copeaks per ten verfts; but I'm informed that travelling is at prefent more expensive.

The river Volehoff takes its rife from the lake Ilmen, runs through the city of Novogorod, and difembogues itfelf into the Ladoga lake. This river is extremely pleafant, is well ftored with a variety of fifh, and has plenty of water-fowls. On its banks are many large and populous, many fweet and pleafant villages. The country is really most delightful, abounding with every thing fit for man and beaft. The foil appears to be light, but very fertile, and the only agriculture there, is that of turning up the clod.

Novogorod Velike, or the great Novogorod, is faid to have formerly been a very great city, and indeed it is very probable it was fo. It was faid to have been deftroyed by Ivan Vafilytch the tyrant, with fuch fury and unheard of cruelty, that I fhall neither pain my reader with fuch cruel relations, nor help to perpetuate the memory of fuch a monfter.

There are faid to be no lefs than nearly 200 monasteries and churches in this city. I fcarcely believe there are twice that number of houses, and those too very mean, and the people poor. Their houfes, ftreets, and walls, are all built of timber, but their monafteries are very grand. Here is a citadel built of ftone, but it is not a regular fortification. Novogorod Velike is the metropolis of a very large province of the fame name. There are at prefent very many villages in Ruffia, much larger than Novogorod, and much better built. It may juftly now be called the city of priefts. It is a bifhop's fee. The metropolitan and others of the clergy, are faid to enjoy very large revenues in land, if the prefent Emprefs has not feized upon part of them, which would undoubtedly be good æconomy, as thefe wretches are the very worft of tyrants over their fellow creatures.

The province of Novogorod is bounded by Ingermanland or Ingria on the north, Pfkopfkoi province on the weft, the province of Mofcow on the fouth, and Bicloozerfke province vince on the eaft. This province is betwixt 56 and 61 degrees north latitude, and betwixt 47 and 56 eaft longitude. The metropolis lies in 58 degrees 25 minutes north latitude, almost fouth-east from St Petersburgh. The lake Ilmen is distant from the city fouth by west 11 versts, and is faid to be 18 Polish miles long from east to west, and 12 broad from fouth to north. This lake is well stored with variety of fine fish.

As very little happened worth the reader's attention on my paffage from Novogorod to Mofcow, I fhall fet down the names of the cities, eams, and their diffances one from the other, all the way to Mofcow, and after that make fome general remarks concerning the country, cities, and villages through which I paffed.

Imprimis, To Brunets verfts 25, to Zuilzoff 30, to Kreflitza 33, to Eafhifbitza 40, to Zymygotze 23, to Earova 22, to Chotelova 38, to Vefhnevolotehock 37, to Vidropfkei-eam 33, to Torzchoak 37, to Medna 33, to Tweer 37, to Gorodyn 30, to Gavidova 30, to Kleen 27, to Binka 30, to Tchurno 25, to Mofcow 28.

These are the names of only the cities or villages where I took refreshment, but there are more villages on the road which I passed through. I added the number of versts, and found them just 725, tho' I'm told, by a late admeasurement they amount to 784. No perfore

A FTER we had lodged one night in No-vogorod, we had orders next morning to embark and proceed by water to Brunets. This fcene exhibited a great deal of tendernefs betwixt the failors and their wives, who had travelled from St Petersburgh to Novogorod, to take their laft farewell of their hufbands, whom they had but finall hopes of ever feeing again, not fo much from fear of the war, as from the inclemency of the climes to which they were bound. The officers waited patiently for about an hour on the banks of the river, and feemed to fympathize with them in their friendly embraces ; but at laft. finding that orders and entreaties could not force the hufbands from their wives, who clung to them, they fent fome fubalterns amongh them, who without ceremony not only parted the loving pairs, but ufed them fo ill. as even flocked my humanity.

The

The bitter lamentations and fervent prayers of the women on fhore, and the filent fignals made to them by their hufbands from the barks, were truly tender and affecting. At laft, all hands were employed in warping, pufhing with ftings, and rowing against the ftream, till we passed under the ftone bridge up the river into the Ilmen lake, which was about the time of the morning prayers.

The Ruffians are extremely devout, and, if poffible, will not let any opportunity flip in putting up their prayers to heaven, efpecially when they are to make very long and dangerous voyages or travels : They therefore ordered the barks to bring to at a monaftery on the north fide of the lake. I went into the church with them, where they ufed very many proftrations and croffings, whilft the priefts were imploring heaven for their fafety and fuccefs.

After prayers were ended, we, having a fair wind, croffed the lake, and arrived at Brunets, where we were foon furnifhed with horfes, and fet out about dinner-time, being the fourth day from St Peterfburgh, and took up our night's lodging in Zuilzoff, after having travelled through a very plentiful fine country. Next morning, according to my cuftom, I departed long before the command, and fo paffed through all the villages formerly mentioned, till we arrived in Tweer, without meeting with any accident.

This country, though more open than betwixt Novogorod and St Peterfburgh, is very full of woods. Hence, as I was told, a Ruffian peafant had begged leave of Peter the Great, to cut a finall canal, in order to join a branch of the rivers Volga and Mfta, which runs into the lake Ilmen ; and, in order to defray his expences, he procured a royal edict. to impose upon paffengers a finall toll at a bridge laid over this canal, and another toll for opening the draw-bridge to let barks pafs and repais from the one river to the other. That great Emperor not only granted the boor's requeft, but nobilitated him, and made the tolls or imposts perpetual to him and his heirs or fucceffors, providing the canal and bridge were kept in good repair, and referved only free paffage for his own armies and fleet.

The peafant performed with great judgment what he had propofed, and his fucceffors live in opulence from the annualrents they get; for by this canal a paffage is opened from St Peterfburgh to Aftrachan for finall barks, and this has not only increafed trade, but rendered the immenfe woods, in that diftant country, ufeful even in St Peterfburgh and Mofcow.

Valdoi is a very pleafant large village, and has a beautiful lake in full view of it. At two miles diftance, almost in the middle of the lake, there is an island and monastery. The island is well covered with trees, and makes a fine fine profpect from the village. When a traveller enters this village, no matter whether Rufs or foreigner, he is immediately furrounded with many girls, wanting to fell wheatbread baked in a particular form, like to plaited ropes, which they call kringlkes. Thefe girls feem to be a different people from the Rufians. I was told they came from the borders of Poland. They are very pretty, and remarkably well coloured. They are alfo extremely kind and obliging to ftrangers, and will, I doubt not, for a fmall confideration, grant them the laft favour.

E ARLY in the morning we arrived in Tweer, croffing the great river Volga on a floating timber bridge. Tweer is a very large city, moftly built with timber, the ftreets are made of the fame materials, fo that when a fire happens in any part, it generally proves dreadful. The greateft part of the city is on the fouth-eaft fide of the river. A citadel, furrounded with earthen ramparts and wooden walls, is on the north-weft of the Volga. Tweer is now formed into a dutchy, and the territories fubject to its jurifdiction are taken from the provinces of Mofcow and Novogo-10d. 120

rod. It is a city of great commerce, fends the produce of Ruffia all the way to Aftrachan, and many other countries, by water, in flat, but very broad and long barks; and, in lieu thereof, it receives goods from India, Siberia, Perfia and Georgia. Of what extent their trade may be, I cannot fay, but it is, no doubt, very confiderable.

On the ninth day from St Peterfburgh, we fet out in the morning, and dined at Gorodin. I told Mr Rannie, that in the nighttime I had a pair of new fhoes and my buckles ftolen from my waggon, notwithstanding I He faid that poffibly this was the flept in it. fame thief who had attempted to fteal his beft coat and veft. After I was gone away, Mr Rannie rofe and followed the thief, and with a hanger almost killed him ; at the fame time they were both feized and carried to the commander, who fent the thief to the governor. who alfo demanded Rannie, but the commander would not only not fend him, but alfo refufed to put him under arreft. The ftealing of my floes and buckles furnished Rannie with a fine plea; and this trifling affair employed the pens of the writers in representing it both to the admiralty, and the governor of Tweer.

A Continuation of the fame, and our Arrival in Moscow.

TROM Gorodin we marched on to Mofcow, where we arrived the twelfth day from St Peterfburgh. The country betwixt Tweer and Moscow is not fo full of woods, but still there are very many, and though the foil is light, yet it produceth plentifully for man and beaft ; but the inhabitants are much given to pilfering, drinking, and many other vices. I cannot help obferving here the magnificent profpect this metropolis (fituated in 55 degrees 10 minutes north latitude, 55 degrees 30 minutes east longitude, diftant from St Petersburgh 730, some call it 734 verfts,) made, at the diftance of fix or feven verfts, for the many thousand turrets, mostly covered with gilt copper, are wonderfully grand and beautiful; but at our arrival, I was not a little furprized to find, that, except a few palaces and churches, the greateft part of this fuperb city was built with timber. I was fcarcely houfed, when I was greatly frightened with a difpute betwixt one of my camfhicks and my old foldier. It feems the eamfhick, afking more money than his fare, words role high, and he reached a fudden den firoke with a great flick, which laid old Firelock flat on the ground.

I was at no great diffance, and, being then young and thoughtlefs, drew my fword, and, had not the fellow retreated, I fhould certainly have wounded, if not killed him ; but he and his comerade run to the other end of the court. By this time my old foldier had recovered his feet, and, the' blooding copioufly, feemed to take little notice of it, but I was very much miftaken; for he, with great deliberation, walked up towards the man that had ftruck him, who, fearing what was to happen, fcrambled to the top of the fhade. His neighbour, not thinking he would hurt him, though the villain had attempted to beat the foldier, flood ftill, but, at one blow with the great brafs hilt of his broad fword, old Firelock brought him to the ground : However, I interpofed, and hindered him from being further hurt. At the very inftant in which my foldier had knocked down the one, the other flipping his feet, fell from the fhade. He was nothing the worfe of the fall, as he fell on his feet : but, though lucky in this refpect, the foldier gave him two blows on the head, both which reached the fkull. I got him at laft confined. Ropped the blood, and dreffed the wounds : but the varlets, in place of returning me thanks, went off with their horfes, threatening to have me and my foldier taken under arreft ; however, I heard no more of them.

MOSCOW is truly a pleafant, large, po-pulous city, and, being almost circular, is faid to be feven verfts in diameter. Has ving but little time to Ipare, I at prefent faw but few curiofities ; however, I went to fee the great bell, which was then in a large pit. A fire had, about two months before this, burnt down near two thirds of this great city, and the belfry, being all of timber, fhared the fame fate ; the bell fell into the bottom of the pit, and had a piece broken out of its edge, large enough to permit any man to go into it. Its weight is faid to be 443,772 lib. Its height is about 21 feet 4 inches, its diameter I could not tell, but it feemed to be very well proportioned. It was impoffible to find out its diameter by measure, as its broadeft lips were funk confiderably into the earth, fo that they could not be meafured. Mr Hanway fays, its weight is 12,327 poods, =443,772 lib. English; its height 21 feet 4 inches, its value L. 65,681 Sterling, its diameter at the top 7 feet 43 inches, and at the bafe, he fays, it measures 22 feet 43 inches.

I then went to the top of a very high tower, called Ivan Velike, or the Great John, I fuppole after the tyrant Ivan Vafilytch. From this tower I had a complete view of the whole city, which indeed made a very grand appearance. The weather being very cold, the Ruffians heat their floves before daylight, and make use of fire at no time of the day, except to get dinner ready, fo that the view is never, but at those times, obstructed by finoke.

Upon the top of this tower there are three bells, I think the leaft of which is larger than the largeft in London. Under the tower is the antient Imperial palace, a large Gothick ftone building. All thefe I have mentioned, and all the imperial antient archives, and different courts of juffice, are in that part of the city called the Crimline, which is furrounded with a high brick wall, faid to be about 2090 paces in circumference. I fhall fay little more about this city at prefent, but fhall make further mention of it at my return to it, when I ftaid four months in it.

I went after this and vifited Mr Tarner, and delivered him a commiffion from my friend Mr Bell of Antermony. He detained me to fupper, and fent me home in his coach. On my way home, I was ftopped a fhort time by a party of dragoons, who patrol through the city in the night-time, notwithstanding there are many thousand citizens who keep watch

The Author leaves Moscow.

TT was now the 20th of September, and the froft was fetting in very faft. At Peterfburgh I bought a very long good morning gown lined with fur ; and I hoped, that, as I was travelling towards the fouth, I fhould ftand in need of no other covering to keep me from the cold, but in this I was much mistaken, and indeed for fome mornings past I had been obliged to get out of my waggon, and run on foot to keep myfelf warm. I was advised therefore, by my foldier and landlord, to buy an wolf's fkin fur, and lucky it was for me that I followed their advice ; for without it, a large furred cap, and the beft boots, I could not have flood out the journey, as the cold was fo intenfe and fevere.

Next morning, fo foon as the ports were open, I left Mofcow, and proceeded in my route to Taverhoff, through the following cities and villages, with the numbers of verfts annexed to them, paying at the fame rate as I had had done from Novogorod to Mofcow per horfe. The 300 failors I never faw after this day, and was now obliged to travel only with my old foldier. Thus equipped and furnished with provisions, I took the following route: Polonna Gorra 5 verfts from Mofcow, to Pachra 29, to Molodie 20, to Laperna 16, to Serpuchoff 25, to Lyriti 10, to Veolmen 25, to Vasham 15, to Tula Eam 30, to Dediloff 10, to Bocharoditza 25, to Kirfofske 12, to Mekilfchoka 10, to Krushova, all defart, 30, to Echvim 15, to Polne, all defart, 45. to Elitika Eam 25, to Tivala 22, to Kallia 17, to Sellochlilnie Eam 25, to Konhalodes 8, to Voronits, all defart, 12, to Taverhoff 10 verfts. In all, from Mofcow to Taverhoff, 437 verfts.

Though I fet out from Mofeow early on the 21ft, yet I could proceed no further than Polonna Gorra, on account of my foldier having drunk too freely with our landlord at Mofeow, fo that I only marched to Pachra late in the evening; after that I continued to travel through the above-mentioned villages, without meeting with any thing remarkable, till I arrived at Tula, (on the 23d) fituated 54 degrees 10 minutes north latitude, and 55 eaft longitude. Here I was detained very agreeably five days, by a general having taken all the horfes from this Eam the day before I arrived.

TRAVELS

Tula is a very large, village, and in it are many forges for making finall arms for the ufe of the army, and a foundery for caffing hand-granades and larger fhells. A few officers and artillery-foldiers fuperintend this work. They told me that the number of workmen confifted of about 2000, and many mafters; that it formerly belonged to Mr Dimidcoff, a rich Siberian merchant, who was the first that wrought the great ironmines of Siberia ; and that in Siberia he had at least 100,000 men at work. Peter the Great gave him great privileges, and, among others, a liberty to engage, for the working in thefe mines, all vagrants and villains, who were afraid of being impreffed into the army, or of punishment due for their crimes; befides, many thousand criminals who did not deferve death, were fent there to work for a fixed time, or during their lives, at a very fmall wage.

But I was again told, that the Empress Elifabeth had nobilitated the grand-children of the old Dimidcoff, redeemed the grant of Peter the Great, and put the iron mines into the pofferfion of the crown; but I have a ftrong fuspicion this will not fucceed, for certain realons, which I may afterwards have occasion to mention.

The Author's journey from Tula to Taverboff.

HAVING ftaid at Tula five days, and been most agreeably entertained by the artillery officers, I left it on the 28th of September about one o'clock P. M. I had not travelled four verfts till I began to experience to what diffreffes travellers are fubject, and muft fubmit. A north eaft wind blew violently, accompanied with a very finart froft; The road here was deep, from the rain that had fallen, and from the marching of fome foldiers to one of the armies acting against the Turks; but notwithstanding the froft, it was not hard enough in many places to bear up our machines. The puddle, however, froze to the wheels, and we were frequently obliged to halt and cut it. to make them turn round; add to this, the fnow drove to furioufly in our faces, that we loft our way, nor could we fee twice the length of a horse before us. Thus fatigued. bewildered, and afraid of being frozen to death, we were ready to defpair, when, in an inftant, we heard the barking of dogs at no great diftance : This difpelled our fears. revived our fpirits, and following the found.

we foon arrived at a fmall village, called Dediloff, belonging to an officer in the guards.

ty

We proceeded to a great gate, as the cuftom is, and defired admittance for the night. Two fervants, armed with halberds, told us in a furly manner, that we fhould have no harbour there, and threatned our lives if we attempted to force our way. Old Steven, for that was my foldier's name, recommended himfelf to St Nicolas, fcrewed his bayonet on his musket, and fwore that the first man who durft to advance, flould inftantly be fent to the devil. He then, by the affiftance of our eamfhicks, got on the top of the gate, and made as if he intended to fire into the court; upon which, the party thought proper to retreat into the house. The foldier opened the gate, and let us all in. He next defired me to put on my fword, and fcrew the bayonet on my fowling-piece, for he faid, there was no trufting to these wretches, which I believe might be true. I did as he advifed, and in this manner we entered the houfe. When we came to the door, Steven again let them know, that if the leaft violence was but offered to any of us, none of their lives would be fpared ; that, as we had the honour to ferve the Empress, we were determined rather to die like men, than to be frozen to death.

But how much was I furprifed, when we entered into a large room, to fee a very pretty lady furrounded by many maidens ! I made her all the compliments I could, and ordered Steven to affure her we were in the fervice, and that I would answer for the behaviour of my people, providing her's were quiet; and that I always flept in my travelling waggon, and only defired, that he and the drivers might be allowed to fleep in fome warm room ; to which fhe agreed : She appeared however fomewhat fullen, and while we were taking fide-views of one another, an old man, with a long white beard, entered the room, and, after having enquired into the caufe of the diffurbance, told me, that he was very forry that it had fo happened, but added that the authors fhould be punifhed. He faid, that young lady was his fon's wife, and that her hufband was in the army; that he himfelf had long ferved Peter the Great, and confequently wished well to the army ; that the village was his, and but a little way from our right road ; he prefied me to go to his houfe to partake of a fupper, to which I had not the finalleft objection.

Indeed, this old gentleman regaled me in a princely manner: He faid, it would be impoffible for me to proceed in my travelling waggon if the froft continued; and therefore ordered a great fledge to be fitted up to receive my waggon with its wheels; which was to expeditioufly done, that when I took my leave of him to go to bed in my waggon, every every thing was fixed ; and, with much difficulty, I was allowed to give his men a ruble for their trouble.

A travelling waggon is a most convenient vehicle, made like to an oblong coach, with a coach-box for the driver to fit on, in which are placed a finall bed and pillows: It is covered with leather, and lined with baize. I therefore rather chose to fleep in my waggon, than in a room full of people and naufeous finells, and indeed, with the help of good furs, and a wax candle, burning half an hour after it was buckled up, I flood out the greateft frofts very comfortably. This old gentleman was a most agreeable landlord, his company fuch as I loved much : He gave me a fhort hiftory of the life and actions of Peter the Great, of which he was very capable, as he belonged to the guards, and many times had fought under his immediate orders, and near his perfon ; and indeed he was to wonderfully agreeable and entertaining that had not Lethe overcome Steven my interpreter, I believe neither of us would have thought of fleep till early in the morning : But we parted at midnight, and I never faw my friendly hoft again, for next morning, before I awakened from fleep, we were fome miles diftant from this village.

After this, we paffed on till we arrived at a fingle houfe, near a village called Echvim, fituated on this fide of a defart, 45 verfts over over, where nothing but fky and fnow was to be feen, without meeting any thing worth relating. The Ifba, or warm room was very large, but a number of mafons and other labourers had taken pofferfion of it in their way from Voronits, fo that there was fcarcely room for me to fit down.

I expressed my fears to Steven, that they might fteal fomething from my waggon; and therefore, as we did not intend to ftay long, proposed that he and I should interchangeably watch the waggon and baggage. But he was of another opinion, and advifed me to charge my pipe with tobacco, and to put near the top fome affa foetida mixed with tobacco, for, faid he, " When you have lighted it, and they observe the affa foetida begin to burn, then to blow from me, I will anfwer for the confequence." The common people in Ruffia are extremely religious and ignorant, and confequently extremely fuperflitious. They believe that no perfon, or nation can have the leaft chance of being faved. even by the merits of our Saviour, unlefs they profess the Greek religion : they imagine that they have lefs or more fome correfpondence with the devil : and that those who profess any branch of medicine, are his most intimate friends, hence, the following affair will not furprife the reader.

I did as the foldier had directed, those next me perceiving the finell of fomething more more than tobacco, began to retire to the door, where Steven did not fail to raife their fufpicions and fears to the greatest height. but when I had blown out the rich fumes of affa foetida, they reached those on the top of the flove first, who, coughing exceffively, jumped down with the greatest precipitation on their neighbours, frightened out of their wits, and, in the hurry to get out of the room, fome were not a little bruifed. Upon their retreat, Steven entered laughing, and told me that were we to remain all day and night, the landlord himfelf would not enter the houfe, that he was certain their prieft would be fent for to fanctify the house by prayers, holy waters, and fumigations : He faid as it was Lent, if he had not got them out, he must have fasted that day, as he had nothing to eat but what I left, and this by the Ruffians is effected pagana, or unclean. This indeed, would have been fevere treat. ment to Steven; for none loved their paunch or eafe better than himfelf : Thus having dined plentifully, and fed our horfes, who had performed but a finall journey : We proceeded, at about the distance of a quarter verft, and paffed all the miferable people, whom we had turned out, fome fitting on the fnow, others running about, others playing at hand and foot to keep themfelves warm. We had not travelled four verfts further, when a young Coffack came up with us, at which time our eanfhicks were infinuating that they were afraid they fhould not find the road.

TRAVELS.

I enquired of this young man, he faid, he was not acquainted with the road, but believed we were very right, I promifed him a trifle, if he would keep us company, to which he agreed. We had not travelled much further till the fky, which was ferene before, began to overcaft, and was fucceeded by a thick fall of fnow. The young man at this feemed much difinayed, and told me that many people had been loft by fuch accidents, who were well acquainted with the defart at other times, in fhort, we continued to travel on, in the heavy fall of fnow, till the young man rode forward, and for fome time difappeared, but at last returned and affured us, that we were right, for that he had difcovered a valley hard by, well known to him.

We proceeded to this valley, where he defired us to feed our horfes. We did fo, and then proceeded. We had hardly gone five verfts further, when the fky turned clear, the wind abated, and in fhort, the cold decreafed fo much, that it appeared to be thaw. The horfes were much fatigued, though we were ftill about 10 verfts diftant from our defigned village.

Afraid of being obliged to take up my lodging in the defart, I walked on foot, and obliged obliged my foldier and the reft to do the fame, but at laft, being conflitutionally unable to bear much fatigue, I was obliged to betake myfelf to the waggon. We had not travelled far, when I obferved the foldier fitting behind my waggon, I upbraided him, and ordered him to get off ; he did fo, and, as I believed, imagined I could not proceed without him ; for he laid himfelf down upon the fnow, nor offered to ftir, when we were at leaft a verft diffant from him. I was told this by the eamfhicks, and indeed faw him myfelf, but afraid, Steven would become my mafter, had I yielded to his humour, I ordered the eamfhicks to drive on to the village, nor did I difcover my thoughts about him to any perfon : I had it always in my power to have fent in fearch of him, but deemed it right to allow a reafonable time for his arrival ; and indeed, he did not deceive me, for he arrived before I expected him, and for his excufe, he faid he was feized with a violent cholic, and could not fo much as acquaint me with the reft of his complaint.

I told him that I underftood his difeafe, that I was determined not to be trifled with, and that he might provide himfelf with meat and drink for the future unlefs, he were to behave better in time coming; for though I could fpeak but a little of the Rufs, I would get him punifhed for his obftinacy. Upon this, he afked pardon, and promifed to act fo no more : Thus

Thus we were friends, and he behaved well till we arrived at Taverhoff.

The truth was, he was afraid that the wolves would have made a meal of him, and I was of the fame opinion, and this made him repair fo very expeditionfly to the village. Having arrived fafe at Polno 45 verfts from our laft ftage, I was as glad as a general could be of having gained a victory, for indeed, we ran a great rifque of lofing our road, of being frozen, or ftarved, or of being devoured by wolves, who are fometimes feen to the number of three or 400 together, and fo furious are they, as I have been told, that they enter villages, and fometimes devourmen and beafts.

From Polno, we met with nothing worth relating, till we arrived at Voronits, though we paffed through another finall defart betwixt Koukalodis and Voronits, being only 12 verfts. Having day light, we marched on 10 miles further to Taverhoff, fituated in 52 degrees, 30 minutes north latitude, 57 degrees, fix minutes east longitude, where I arrived on the fourth of October: Thus in 26 days, I marched from St Peterlburgh to Taverhoff, diftant from Molcow 443 verfts. in most books, it is called Towrow very improperly : Let it therefore once for all be remembered, that I fpell names according as the Ruffians found them. If any ftranger was to pronounce them as I have fpelled them anri I them, every Ruffian would readily underftand what is meant, but if they were to enquire of a Ruffian according to the pronunciation of former writers, I can engage that none but fuch as are used to foreign pronunciations, could understand what was meant : My knowledge of the Ruffian language makes me quite certain of this point.

Captain Carrabine, a Ruffian, who had been in England, and fpoke the language well, was commander of the port. He faid, that notwithftanding my delays at Mofeow and other places, I had made a very expeditious journey, confidering how heavy the carriages were to the finall number of horfes. Though from the map, it would appear that Veronits is not far from Mofeow, yet the neceffity to get provision and horfes, oblige travellers to take a very crooked and round-about road.

Taverhoff it will appear is very near due fouth from Mofeow: I was told, (for as all the country was covered with fnow, I could be no judge of it) that the country is very rich in provision for men and beafts. I believe this to be very true; for I experienced no want, and at fuch a finall price, that it would feem incredible to people who never had been out of Britain.

As my flay in Taverhoff was very fhort, I fhall fay no more of it nor of Veronits till my return. At my arrival, Captain Carrabine behaved most difcreetly. He had me frequently to dinner or fupper, and feemed as if he could not want me : He faid my new commander Prince Golitzin was an exceeding good man. that he at prefent was in Kotchatoff on the river Don, not far from the city Teherkafkoi, which is fituated within 20 verfts of Aloph, well fortified with many cannon, and where the Hetman or Prince of the Coffacks relides, that he may have the earlieft notice of any depredations from the neighbouring Tartars : He faid, that as Mr Burman, the only furgeon they had to attend the officers, marines, and failors belonging to the port, as also the hospital, was fick, and efpecially as he well knew the Prince, in about a month or fix weeks. would return with his command; he, for thefe reafons, thought it needlefs to fend me to Kotchatoff, where I would be very uncertain of finding him, fince he, Carrabine, was certain, fo foon as he fhould receive orders from the admiralty, he would lofe no time in coming to Taverhoff. dive bereves sew younos off

Thus I paffed my time in attending the fick in the hofpital and garrifon, till the beginning of December. About this time, one evening having fupped at Carrabine's, he told me, that Mr Burman was out of fome medicines; therefore, faid he, I doubt not you'll readily gave him from your's what may be at prefent needful; that he was certain the Prince would take it in good part, and thank me me for doing fo. I anfwered him, that my inftructions from the Medicine chancery ordered, that, by my oath to the government, I fhould carefully carry thele medicines for the ufe of the men under the orders of Prince Golitzin my commander, and there break open the feal, and require a centinel, as the cuftom of Ruffia is, to be appointed, with his drawn fword, to guard thefe medicines, left any might make free with them without my knowledge; and that I fhould not dare to give any part of them to any perfon, except fuch as were immediately under the Prince's command, as I fhould anfwer at my peril to God and the Emprefs.

I faid, thefe were my orders, and that, tho' I was extremely fenfible of the eafy and elegant civilities he had fhewn me, I was yet de: termined to act conformably to my inftructions. I at the fame time affured him, that I would not only give him and his lady proofs of my gratitude and refpect, but was also willing to do every thing in my power for the recovery of the meaneft of his fervants. He anfwered, that he knew I had fuch inftructions ; that every one entrufted with her Majefty's medicines had the fame ; that, however, it was looked upon as a mere form, and that the Medicine chancery well knew, that their furgeons not only lent their medicines, but cured with them her Majefty's officers, their wives, children, and fervants. I anfwered, that what-whatever others might do, I was determined. though at the peril of my life, not only to keep my oaths, but allo my promifes inviolable, both to her Majefty, and to all men. Upon this the captain began to flow many airs, fit only, as I told him, to frighten children ; and, amongst other things, he told me, that he would take Stephen from me. This, I affured him, was only in the power of the fupreme court of admiralty, or of my immediate commander Prince Golitzin, and that, if he did fo, I would immediately difcontinue all duty, and have it decided by a court martial; and thus I left him. Next morning, as I was on duty in the hofpital, a writer put into my hand a paffport, telling me at the fame time, that I must fet out that very day. I commanded him out of the hofpital, and confulted with Mr Burman what was to be done. He, well knowing how unfit he was, by reafon of his difeafe, to attend the fick, and how uncertain his time of life might be, by a petition to the Cantoir, required that I might be detained in Taverhoff. So brutal was the vain Carrabine, that he gave no car to this, but go I muft. I acknowledge I had no liking to this journey in the winter feafon, though it would have been most agreeable in the fummer, as my route lay thro? the pleafantest country of the Ukraine, on the beautiful banks of the Don, the ancient Tanais : However, I, in hopes the Brince might arrive arrive every day, poftponed it as long as I could; and indeed it was fix days after I had got my pafs, before I thought to go in ear, neft. The incenfed Carrabine imagined I was gone, as I had not appeared in public; but that day, I walked by his houfe on purpofe: He no fooner faw me, than he expreffed his furprize how I durft loiter away my time. I told him, that I neither had received money for my journey, nor were any horfes to be found in Taverhoff.

This was indeed, as intended, to him a reproof, but in a fhort time I had both, and, recommending myfelf to the guidance of heaven, inftantly fet out, on the 1 oth of December, accompanied with my old fellow-traveller, Stephen, and took the following route, for which I paid per verft as formerly.

To Ufinan verfts 15, to Skorits 60, to Skeftacoff 35, to Pauloffky 37, to Kafhkin 20, to Mamonill 22, to Brutchock 22, to Matufhka Loch 22, to Kazanka 22, to Mofshack 38, to Molan 22, to Bufhkonaften 23, to Ufkadvid 21, to Ufkaper 12, to Aftratfkaja 27, to Wifemadits 12, to Kafpopin 20, to Klidfka 17, to Perikapfka 50, to Grigoryoffka 24, to Serotine 10, to Belafke 32, to Golobinfke 45, to Petifbe 35, to Chirie 33, to Kizni Chirie 10, to Kakeiglikina 19, to Hauloff 19, to Zimalikie 7, to Kiriman 17, to Nagafkin 17, to Kurman 13, to Ugham 13, to Koftikin 13, to Ternosfkoi 9, to Romanoffkoi

24, to Kirgala 8, to Kamushink 6, to Bustriaske 10, to Karagla 3, to Michaelkom 14, to Nishi Michaelkom 3, to Kagalak 18, to Vedernik 7, to Babbe 4, to Zoloto 10, to Kotehatova 10. Thus I arrived at Kotehatova, on the 23d of December, by the route Mr Carrabine pointed out, being in all above 930 versts. This long journey I accomplished in thirteen days and nights, for when the villages were not far distant, I had fresh horses at every village, whereas in Russia one can have them only at Eams, but the Cossacks bear all burdens equally.

I fhall now take notice of a few incidents which befel me on the road. Firft, I left Taverhoff in no good humour, by which means I had forgot to lay in a good ftore of frefh meat. Bread I had enough : Betwixt Ufman and Skorits I met with nothing to buy ; but near Skorits, as Stephen was upon the ramble, we efpied at a post-house, a foldier and post-boy bringing betwixt them a very large pike on a pole; and, asking the vahue, they required three copeaks, which was very readily agreed to.

This good fortune was very agreeable, and would have been fo, had they afked three fhillings. We were told, that at Pauloffky, the Emprefs had another grand fabrick for all forts of finall arms. At this place we provided ourfelves with provifions, and, without lofs of time, fet out, meeting with nothing remarkable. remarkable, till near to Mofhack, Stephen affured me that a kind of heath fowl, who had perched upon trees at no great diftance, were deaf, and excellent food, and that if I could get near enough, without being perceived, I might kill fome. Accordingly I got behind a large tree, at no great diftance from them, and killed three, which, when falling, I observed the reft to look at ; but at laft, whether they perceived me or not, they flew away ; however, thefe three were excellent food. The Ruffians call these fowls gluchoi teterks, or deaf, to diffinguish them from another kind which hear well, and never perch on trees. At Molan I observed the streets were narrow, and I defired the magistrates, who are the most hofpitable people in the world, that I might get a fafe place to put my fledges in, for fear of thieves. At this they laughed heartily, and affured me I was now in the Ukraine amongst the Dons Coffacks.

In Ruffia, they faid, there were thieves; but it was fearcely ever heard that any thing was ftolen by the Coffacks, for that thieves among them were inftantly punished with death.

A Continuation of the fame, and fome Account of the Coffack Government.

T Begged they would give me fome fhort in-I formation about their government, and they complied with my defire in the following manner: They, faid they, were fo far fubject to the laws of Ruffia, as to oblige themfelves to affift the Imperial army with a certain number of troops, when required : That they, being borderers with the Crim Tartars and Turks, were natural foldiers : That therefore they were under the protection of the Empress, but had their own Prince called Hetman Velike : That the Hetman was ordinarily appointed by the Emprefs, choien from amongst them : That they made laws for themfelves, providing they were not repugnant to, nor clashed with those of the Empire :. That every citizen thro' the whole Ukraine, above 21 years of age, had a vote in every thing done; and confequently could not be ignorant of the laws which they affented to. They faid, that when the army refided amongst them, it was not at all times agreeable, if not commanded by judicious men: that the only redrefs they had, was to complain to their Hetman, who reprefented their. complaints to St Petersburgh ; and that most commonly commonly they got redrefs. I indeed found afterwards, that the army was afraid of complaints from them. They told me of a theft of cattle which had been committed in a certain village by fome Kalmucks, who immediately fled to the defart : That, without delay, the villagers gave their next neighbours notice, and thefe to others, &c. &c. fo that in little more than 24 hours the whole Ukraine was in motion, and every village, or little city, fent out a party of horfemen to fcour the defarts. In fort the thieves were taken. with the horfes they had ftolen, and immediately conducted to the village where the theft was committed. The magiftrates of that village conveened the inhabitants, who encircled the town-clerk, prieft and thieves in the market-place, under the canopy of heaven, and, after they had all heard what was alledged against them, and the defences of the thieves, the magistrates ordered the fame to be read by the writer, and required the Coffacks to determine, Whether guilty or not? which is done by putting on, or off their caps, and the majority carries it ; (the Coffacks never move their caps to one another.) It fell out that the Kalmucks were found guilty by a great majority. The priefts then recommended to the thieves to make their peace with God, for they were inftantly to be put to death. They were immediately carried in boats into the middle of the river Don, their arms pinioned, T and

and a parcel of fand, tied up in a cloath. put about their necks to fink them. Then, without further ceremony, they were thrown out of the boat. Their Lord offered to pay any thing reafonable to fave them, but the Coffacks were inexorable ; notwithftanding. he threatened to complain to the Emprefs. which indeed he did, but to little effect; for he was ordered to allow none of his men to fojourn in the Ukraine. They faid their magiftrates continued in office only one year; and that a poor man, if fenfible and upright, had the fame chance to be preferred as a rich one. It feems riches have no great weight, and are in no great effimation there ; and indeed I never faw a beggar among them.

They have great plenty of provisions, and confequently are under no temptation to Acal. I am convinced, that I did not pay a fixpence value for all the provision I had need of for me and my men, in travelling through their country ; for, if I flayed any time, their magistrates, for the honour of their town, used to fend me fowls and fifh, and a bottle of fpirits, which Stephen loved well; as alfo fome ale or mead : And, when they underftood my profession, the fick asked my advice, for which they commonly fent fowls of all kinds, which I have often refufed, becaufe I could not difpofe of them. The Coffacks are dreffed in long toge like the Ruffians, and the women differ from the Ruffian women only in this, that that they wear on their heads a cap, with a front flanding up about a foot above their heads, in form of a crefcent, either embellifhed with ducats of gold, pearl, or beads, or all three formed together, according to their different fancies.

Rich people may have better houses than others, with a piece of ground inclosed for their use and conveniency, but the defart is free to them all alike; confequently a poor man, if he can purchafe a cow and ewe, may have plenty before he turns old. They neither will make a prefent of, nor fell any young creature, faying, that it is contrary to reafon to think, for as great a love as the Supreme Being may have for man, that his defign was, that man fhould kill young creatures at pleafure, as it feemed in fome degree to be a contradiction to the very defign of the creation ; and that none but crazy foolifh people, and fuch as prefer pampering their bellies to every reafonable thought, can think otherwife.

They are all Chriftians of the Greek perfuafion; but by the wars in Sweden, Foland, Turky, and Perfia, they are not near fo fuperfitious as the common Ruflians; and, altho' they have a great regard for their priefts, they will yet punish them, when guilty of crimes, as well as other men. Every man who comes into their country to refide among them, is made a denizon, and inftantly has all the immunities and privileges of a Coffack.

Coffack. They will give to ftrangers all titles due to their rank in the world, but they think no title more honourable than to be called Coffack, meaning by that their freedom and honour in war, and honefty to every perfon, except enemies; nor can it be faid that they are generous enemies, for if they cannot take prifoners eafily, they murder them without any hefitation, alledging that it is the fortune of war, and that their enemies do juft the fame to them; but I have converfed with fome Swedes and their offspring, who feemed well enough fatisfied with their fortune, nor had they the leaft defire to return into their own country.

CHAP. XXXVI.

A continuation of the same.

I continued to travel night and day through the above mentioned villages, which, after we paffed Serotine, are all furrounded with a foffa and rampart, having ordinarily two gates and fome cannon, and indeed they have great reafon to do fo, as will be immediately feen. The Don abounds with many excellent fifh, as flurgeons, flirlets, &c. and there is great plenty of game on its banks, which are covered with almost continued forefts. The beautiful large grey eagle loves this land of liberty, and indeed, by his fearlefs freedom, made me think he was a real native. I wanted to try what execution a ball would make upon two of them walking at fome diftance, but the Coffacks prevented me, faying, that they were not afraid of man, and that they fometimes did mifchief : That they made very free with their geefe and lambs, and were known to fly away with the finaller fheep.

Belafke is diftant from Gobulinfke 45 verfts. Betwixt thefe towns there are two roads, one upon the banks of the Don, the other through the defart. My Coffacks told me of them, and faid the one through the defart was every way better, and that the other by the Don was through woods, and fometimes infefted by the Kalmucks, very uneven, and the longeft of the two : That the road through the defart was free of all incumbrances whatfoever ; and that, at about 25 verfts diffance, there was a folitary mill, where we could refresh our ourselves and feed our horses. It is eafy to imagine that I refolved to go by the defart, efpecially as it was in the night-time, which deprived me of amufing myfelf with the varieties and beauties of the country.

We therefore proceeded with good horfes, arrived at the mill about ten o'clock at night, and no fooner had we ftopped, than five ftately clever young men came out, made us heartily welcome, and defired we would walk in, where there was a good fire, of which we were were very glad. They did not ftop here, but offered us a glafs of fpirits, thereafter mead, and ale as much as we pleafed, at which my trufty Stephen rejoiced, and took two or three powerful pulls, which would have foon flupified him, had I not ordered him to retire. A little after this, one of my Coffacks came into the mill, and, unperceived by the millers, gave a fign to speak with me. I went to the door, pretending fome neceffary bufinefs; but was furprifed to hear the Coffack fay, "Sir, take care of yourfelf and us, keep company with the millers no longer ; fome officers have lately been loft here, nor could they hitherto ever be heard of." Upon this information, I defired the Coffack to keep himfelf and his comerades in good order, and that I would, without lofs of time, retire, as if I was to take a fleep, defiring him to fend Stephen to me; for as yet, though I had learned many vocables, fince I left St Peterfburgh, I could not keep up conversation, nor, in fuch an intricate affair, was fure but they, if villains, as I fuspected they were, might find out my defign.

When Stephen came, I begged to know if I could have a warm place or room to retire to, to take two or three hours fleep. They feemed extremely glad of this, told me that they had fome zemlenkes*, and that I fhould have have the beft. Accordingly they fhewed me where I was to go. I ordered my bed and arms to be taken out of the waggon before them, and carried to the zemlenke, defiring Stephen to tell the millers, that a little fleep ferved me, and that none might diffurb me for two or three hours, admonifhing them at fame time, that, as we were ftrangers, if we were unexpectedly diffurbed, they would have themfelves to blame if they were hurt, becaufe, after fuch admonition, we would undoubtedly fire upon them.

Accordingly, I and old Stephen had one of these zemlenkes, and the Coffacks another, the millers retiring into the mill. When the mill-doors were fluit, the Coffacks, with all expedition, yoked their horfes, my foldier and I put the things into the waggon, and inftantly drove off. Our way lying very near the mill-door, the noife which the horfes and fledges made alarmed the millers, who came altogether in great hafte to the mill-door, and, though their defign was not known, yet we gueffed at it. The foldiers and Coffacks ordered them to remain where they were, if they valued their lives. They took our advice, and were in the right, for every one of us were ready to fire upon them. When we had got out of danger, the Coffacks told me. that vered with the fame under ground. They are very warm, and not to be known but by a finall door, and an opening on the top for a window.

that two or three officers, convoyed in the fame way I was, fet out by this mill, and never were heard of more.

That the neighbouring Coffacks had interrogated the millers, who denied their having ever had any knowledge about them : That an order, by the authority of the Court of St Petersburgh from the Hetman, was that day received by the magiftrates of Belafke, commanding them to make first enquiry into the conduct of these millers; and lastly, as the millers were not of that country, confequently not well known, it was fufpected they were the murderers of these officers and their convoy. They faid, that next day they would be feized, and examined feparately ; and that this was the reafon, why they had taken fuch care of them felves and me. I never had an opportunity thereafter, to learn any thing further about them.

Thus I continued my journey, till I arrived at Romanofikoi, where the Coffacks, more fcrupulous than their brethren, would not open the gate, though in the day-time, till they had carefully examined my paffport. At this gate two cannon were charged, and a number of men in arms, with matches burning, ready to difcharge the cannon. I was directed to go to the town-house where the Hetmans or magistrates waited for me (for every town in the Ukraine has a town-house, where all public business is transacted, which is a good lodging for all travellers who have no right to regular quarters on the citizens. It is a large room, with feats and tables, and, in the fevereft frofts, always kept warm by the iplauls, or town-officers.) When I arrived, they welcomed me, and produced bread and falt, which is ufual, as I faid before, for the honour of their town. They affured me, that yefterday a body of at leaft 6000 Turkish and Tartarian horse had left their town, after a smart fiege of 48 hours: That within the town there were not at prefent above 20 young men able to frand on the walls : That their townfinen, in company with other Coffacks, to the number of about feven or 8000 were in the Cuban Tartary, making depredations among them; but that an enfign had arrived a few hours before me with fome maials and 30 or 40,000 rubles for the troops in Afoph, and that he was determined to ftay there till he could proceed with fafety. They advifed me alfo to remain with them, faying, that the government would juffify fuch a refolution in fo dangerous times, and that they would think themfelves happy in having one of my profession with medicines, instruments, &c. in cafe of another affault, which they were in no finall dread of. To which I anfwered, that it might appear very reafonable to them, but I observed it in a very different view : That I had fworn to evite no perfonal danger, when her Majefty's fervice demanded

ed my attendance : That they had just now feen the outlines of my orders, commanding me to travel day and night, till I had joined my commander : And finally, that, as it was agreeable to the regulations and common fenfe, I would ftay that night, but next morning, God willing, I would proceed : That if I should happen to be unfortunate, no perfon would be to blame but those who fent me. Therefore I defired that men and horfes might be ready by day-light to go with me, together with as many men as they fhould think neceffary for my fafety. They anfwered, that, from what they had faid, I could eafily fee that they had no fufficient guard to fend against 6000 enemies, but that I should have the fame number of men and horfes granted me, which brought me to this place, and alfo a fenfible refolute man as a convoy, and advised me to keep a good lookout.

Thus having parted in friendfhip, I made my addreffes to the enfign, to encourage him to go with me. He faid, that he had a valuable truft, and only 20 recruits, who had never feen fire; therefore he could put but very little truft in them, and was determined to report this fituation to his fuperiors in Afoph, and patiently wait their orders. My hoftefs, a young Swede, told me, that fhe had mounted the walls almost the whole time the enemy was before them : That fhe believed many had had been killed, for that they made three or four desperate affaults, but could not mafter the rampart ; and at each time the old men, who played the cannon, had galled them excellively; and that, from the walls, fhe had feen them dragging off their dead men with hooks, which they carry with them, in order to conceal the number of their dead ; and that I could fee many of their dead and wounded hories about the town. She faid, there were but few of their folk hurt, becaule they never appeared unlefs the enemy was at a distance, or just at the walls, when they never failed to give them a well-marked falute; immediately thereafter they juinped down, and charged, whilft the young men with fome women remained, left they had entered the town. She faid much more to the fame purpofe, with which I shall not trouble the reader.

We fet out next morning early, with great fecrecy, and all the precaution we could, our guide riding a fhort way before us. We paffed Kirgola finoaking in fome parts, as alfo Kamufhink, and arrived at Buftriafke, a large village finoaking in many places, but not a houle ftanding. We oblerved at a finall diftance fome ruinous houfes, where the inhabitants ufed to keep cattle. Thither we went, and having fed our horfes, and taken fome refrefhment to ourfelves, fet out again. Having paffed Kargala, with only one houfe ftanding.

ftanding, in the door of which was a woman, who gave us her beft wifnes, and defired us to take great care that we did not meet with the enemy in the defart. The fun was fet, and we ftill had 14 verfts to go; however, it was our fortune that the defart was well covered with fnow, and the froft very fevere.

We rode on at an ordinary trot for about ten versts, when our guide returning, told us. that fome men were upon the road; we confulted, but for many good reafons drove forward, having new-primed our arms. As we approached the place where they had been, I obferved many finall lights flying up in the air to an immense height ; upon enquiry, the Coffacks told me, that these were fignals to their comerades, to let them know that we were on the road, and prefently we obferved at a finall diftance fix men, three on each fide of the road. I thought that they were within gunfhot, but the Coffacks advifed us not to fire at them, for fear of alarming their companions; whereupon, we drove as faft as the horfes were able to gallop. We at laft arrived on the top of a high mountain, lefs than half a mile from Michaelkom, in all fafety.

The people in that town having been alarmed, only kept us at the port for fome time, till they were affured we were friends, and the next day we reached Kotchatoff, on the 23d of December.

Anibaen

After

After deducting the time I fpent at Tula and Taverhoff, I was only 34 days in travelling from St Peterfburgh to Kotchatoff, which amounts to 2103 verits, although heavy loaded, which was upwards of 64 verfts per day. I can give no right defcription of this country, as it was all covered over with fnow; but was told, that it was very fruitful; and certainly, in time of peace, it is an agreeable country. It is diftant about 30 English miles north from Aloph. Kotchatoff is in 47 degrees 8 minutes north latitude, and in 60 degrees east longitude, distant from Taverhoff, by the road on the Don, 930 verfts. It is but a finall village. The Prince had three barks, with fome cannon, ammunition, and materials for cutting of wood to build veffels for navigating the Palus Mœotis againft the Turks; but of this I fhall fay more hereafter. Upon vifiting the places on the Don, none was found fo proper as the Ico-. rits ; wherefore, we only remained after my arrival in Kotchatoff till the 5th of January 1738.

However, before I proceed, in my return, I muft again acquaint the reader, that about that time, or very foon after our departure, the Coffacks, who had been employed in Cuban, returned, after having deftroyed that open country, and carried off much plunder, many prifoners, flocks, and cattle. It feems the Turkifh Tartars hovered about, and I believe lieve were the fame who put us in a fright, when on our return. The Coffacks, as I faid, returning flushed with victory, and loaded with plunder, (no doubt had notice with what barbarity the Tartars had acted upon the Don) met them in the woods not far from the ruins of the burnt villages. They took their measures fo well, and hemmed them in fo effectually, that they cut 4000 of them in pieces, and recovered all their own cattle, and living Coffacks, with all the other valuable things in their poffession.

The Coffacks were fo much enraged at the unheard of cruelty, that the Turks had exercifed upon the Coffack prifoners, that they would neither let the dead bodies be buried. nor throw them into the Don, but caft them into two heaps, 2000 to each. The armies. fleet, and Coffacks through the whole Ukraine paid dearly for this; for as the hot weather came on, the dead bodies putrified ; and I was told by fome officers, who paffed by them, that they were obliged to make a circuit of about fix miles diftance, and yet the finell was most offensive: In short, the plague this fummer 1738, raged most dreadfully. and if it did not take its rife altogether, from these heaps of dead, certainly it was increased by them. ## Our return to Taverhoff by the river Don.

H AVING, as I faid, received orders from the admiralty to return to Taverhoff, we fet out from Kotchatoff, (leaving a fmall guard for the barks and implements of war, with orders to proceed for Afoph with the first thaw) on the 5th January 1738, by another road much nearer than by the Don. As we were fometimes obliged, notwithstanding the feverity of the frost, to take up our lodgings in woods, under the canopy of heaven alone; I shall only mention a few of the more remarkable towns on the banks of the Don and Oskol, till we again arrived at Ribna upon the river Soina, almost where its streams join the Don. All these rivers empty themselves into the Don.

In fo doing, I shall observe the same order I have hitherto done. From Kotchatoff to Kundrutze town on the Don, are 53 versts, to Burstra 16, to Kamennol 86, to Gundrofske 45, to Lugan 84, to Krasnaianske 50, to Jamepol 61, to Rareoff, Borissof on the Oskol 47, to Senkoff 56, to Associate 10, to Kamenka 47, to Valviki 36, to Obzunske on the Soina 84, to Ribna 18, to Chovorotak on the Don 50, to Taverhoff 53.

By

By this road, we measured 776 versts betwixt Kotchatoff and Taverhoff, fo that it measures less than the road on the Don by 156 versts.

It is proper, however, to obferve that the Don and Ofkol rivers run through the very middle of Little Tartary; that though the towns are generally pretty well fortified, and have numerous inhabitants, yet the diffances betwixt them are very great, quite uninhabited, and either defart, or full of great woods; for which reafons, it is much expofed in time of war, to the depredations of flying parties of Crim Tartars, who commonly lie in wait upon the fide of the woods, ready to fall upon paffengers, when but few in number.

Our commander, Prince Gallitzin having every thing in readinel's, fet out from Kotchatoff about four o'clock in the morning, with great fecrecy; for the enemy never could learn what was the number of men he commanded: and as he caufed fire a morning and an evening gun, as Vice Admiral and Cenator, they imagined his command muft have been very confiderable. He likewife took the precaution of keeping a very ftrict guard about the town with great judgment.

He allowed none, whether foldiers, failors, or inhabitants, to go out of the town under pain of death. But in truth, it was quite the the contrary, for it is faid, and he did not hefitate to fay to alfo, that the Lords of the Admiralty planned out, and fent him this route, on purpose that he might have been cut off:

His eldeft brother, Prince Demitry, a Senator, one of the wifest men at the helm of affairs, was, in the year 1736, for fpeaking his mind too freely, fhut up during the remaining part of his life in the caftle of Sluffelburgh, and all the Golitzin family were banished, some of them degraded: To which the Empress Anne, the daughter of Ivan or John, chearfully acceded : For the Golitzins are blood relations of Peter the Great, and had it not been for them, and the Nanshkins, the Princets Sophy would have murdered Peter.

Our commander had been for many years before, grand-treasurer to the admiralty: It feems formerly, when the lords of the admiralty happened to be in want of money, they made free to borrow from the treasurer : But, during the whole time of Prince Golitzin's management, they never could get a farthing ; confequently, they were glad to be rid of him. These are faid to be the reasons that they ordered him upon the Don, in fuch perilous times, with a command not exceeding 200 officers and fervants included : Add to this, that he was ordered from St Peterfburgh the fame night, on which his brother was ar-X refted, refted, nor could he have one day allowed him to put his affairs in order, and upon his leaving St Petersburgh, the admiralty was. during four months, clofely employed in examining his books, to fee if they could poffibly find any fault, that they might get his life and effate. All these schemes failing, and people talking with great freedom of their barbarous usage of the Prince, and reports having been long received in St Peterfburgh from the officers, and an engineer under the Prince's command, that no place was found more convenient to build finall veffels than Icorits, distant about 70 versts from Taverhoff, nearer Azoph : Accordingly, he was at last ordered to return as I have faid.

His enemies not doubting, and feeing all their fchemes had proved abortive, but fome blunder would happen to him in the confufion of a command of about 3000 foldiers and failors, and 30,000 peafants.

We arrived at Kundritze town on the Don, about mid-day. It was here I had the firft opportunity of feeing with what refpect thefe people received Ruffian grandces, and truly, I muft fay, that it was next to adoration : I was informed however, that the Coffacks efleemed the Golitzin family preferable to any in the whole Empire, and were well acquainted with the cloud which hovered over it. It is fomething remakable that through all all Little Tartary, they paid as great refpect to this good, old, noble general, as if he had had the power of life and death. They brought him many prefents, but he frankly told them, that as he flood in need of no prefents, he confequently would accept of none, but would not refule fome victuals; becaufe he knew they would not permit him to buy, and he could get them no other way, and indeed, his fledges were loaded with provifions, that he might fland in no need by the way. Not fatisfied with having regaled the Prince and his officers plentifully, they did not forget his men, whereby, that very evening, I was involved in a good deal of trouble, attended with the moft exquifite anxiety.

At our arrival, the Coffacks fent off fome of their men armed, to give the next town notice of the Prince's arrival, and to warn them to have a fufficient number of fresh horfes ready upon his arrival, that he might not be hindered in the least to proceed with all the expedition he pleafed : Accordingly, having refreshed ourfelves about two hours, we fet out betwixt two and three of the clock P. M. and had fcarcely reached a mile till we were alarmed with an irregular firing of cannon at the last town. Some of our convoy, (for they fent as many armed Coffacks, as they could fpare, from one town to the next. arts next, and this practice they continued thro* our route, till we arrived at Taverhoff ) begged leave of the Prince, to return to defend their own town, not doubting that the Tartars had made an attack upon it.

The Prince very readily allowed as many to go as pleafed, but the greater part flaid with us. We had proceeded about two verfts after this, mending our pace for fear of the Tartars, when our adjutant came to me, and told me that one of the medicine chefts with the men belonging to it were not come for-ward, and that if it was loft, I would be charged with it. I not knowing at this time, the truth of his affertion, returned accordingly, my mate and Mr Bowman, whole cheft it properly was, accompanied me, tho' I entreated him to ftay by the command, alledging that it was quite needlefs for us both to run the rifque of being either killed, or taken prifoners by thefe barbarians : But he was as much afraid of lofing the medicines as I was, and indeed it was more his charge. as I had not received them from him. We had not drove back two verfts, when a Coffack on horfeback difcovered the people we wanted, in a finall valley, a little way from the right road. It feems, they had been making too free with their bottle, while in Kundrutze, and being quite flupid with liquor, they loft their road, and with all the tranquillity imaginable, had lain down on the the fnow and fell fast asleep, notwithstanding the great frost, and noise the cannon made hard by them.

Mr Bowman very foon brought them to their fenfes with a fevere whipping, and ordered them to drive on before us, as fast as the horfes could gallop. We did not overtake the Prince till we arrived at Buiftra : The Coffacks who had returned to Kundrutze overtook us, and told that all was well in their town ; that the magistrates having neglected to pay their compliments to the Prince with their cannon, at his arrival in their town, they thought it their duty to do fuch a piece of neceffary ceremony at his departure ; and that this was the caufe of our alarm. It was a cuftom, and I believe a law, that when any flag or general officer approached any cities or towns of note, which had cannon mounted, to falute him with more or lefs cannon, according to his rank in the army or fleet; but I do not believe the Coffacks were fubjected to this, because they bought all their own ammunition ; whereas in Ruffia, the powder and all other ammunition belongs to the Empress. I was informed that when the Prince received this information. that he fent orders to all the towns through which he was to pais, to keep their powder for the fafety of their towns, acquainting them, that the ceremony was very difagreeable to him, and not only unneceffary and expensive expensive to them; but exposed them in time of war to the danger of want of powder, when they might have much more occafion for it: Efpecially, as he was well informed that parties of the enemy were hovering about, who would be glad to find them unprepared. After this, nothing uncommon happened till we arrived at Gundrofske: Betwixt this laft town and Lugan are computed 84 verfts; confequently no horfes could carry us through, without reft and food. About 20 verfts diftant from Gundrofske is a small village, where we halted to refresh ourfelves and cattle in the day time. After we had given our horfes two or three hours feeding, we fet out in the afternoon, but before we had travelled 20 verfts, night came on, and we were still forced to proceed 20 versts further, till we arrived in a very great wood, where we had fires made in many places, to get our food warmed, and alfo, as it was extreme hard froft, to foften the air. The horfes which were yoked before the medicines, &r. were quite tired, fo that I arrived later than any of our men.

At our arrival, my appetite was very keen, but I had nothing to eat, except a piece of very good roafted beef frozen quite hard, my bread was in the fame condition. Stephen, my only help-mate, and I, with no finall trouble thawed our victuals before the fire, then fcraped off a little and eat it, as I was very tired, I defired Stephen to bring my bed, and lay it down upon the fnow, upon which, I ftretched myfelf a fhort while, with my feet to the fire, and left Stephen to heat, forape, and eat as much as he pleafed.

The Prince, when obliged to take up his abode in the fields, trufted none of his officers, but was wont to go round his men, and fee that the centinels were alert, and the reft in good order. As he was thus employed, he found me on my bed, and Stephen very bufy eating. He asked if I was well? I infantly role, but Stephen told him every thing which had happened; he took me by the hand, and defired me to go with him, I obeyed, we went together to another fire, where his officers were buly eating fome exceeding good fifh foup very warm. He ordered to give me a fpoon, which I exercifed well, and got also a few glaffes of excellent wine. He fpoke to me frequently : But I believe he could only guess at my answers; to much kindnefs I could obferve, fretted not a little his adjutant, and indeed, as he ufed too great freedom with the Prince, I thought he faid that probably I would not in time deferve fo much kindnefs, at which I am certain the Prince was very angry. Having eat and drunk heartily; I paid my compliments to the Prince, and his officers, except the adjutant, of whom I have ever retained a bad opinion.

Before day-light, the whole command was in motion. My people, having been very tired the night before, were not fo foon ready as the others, which was lucky for the Prince. It feems the Coffacks upon watch had given information, that, as they heard a noife among the trees, they fufpected the enemy had discovered us. This report foon fpread, and he was best off who could get fooneft away. Our horfes, as I faid before, were heavy loaded, and probably not fo good as the reft; wherefore, we were obliged to march on flowly. We had not drove many verfts from the wood, when we observed a cheft, which, though not large, I fufpected might contain the Prince's plate, on account of its weight. Day now began to appear.

We travelled on till we were within three or four verits of Liegon, the country free of woods, and the fun fhining bright, when our heroic adjutant, Balotnicoff, (for that was his name,) appeared with a guard of four foldiers. and, with a loud voice, and a very haughty air, afked If we had feen a cheft? Stephen answered in the affirmative, and, pointing, told him, it was lying a-crois my fledge, and faid, that I would carry it to the Prince. Balotnicoff put on fuch airs, that I refolved to jet him know that I was determined not to bear his impertinence : But he, miftaking the gentle anfwers I gave him by my foldier, as if cauled through fear of him, alighted from his his horfe, came forward with his foldiers to take the cheft per force. Upon which, I took up a carrabine which lay by me, laid it on my knee, as if ready for any thing, and ordered my men to drive on. The gallant Balotnicoff and his foldiers mounted their horfes, and rode oif, threatening me no doubt. In flort, we arrived but a little after him, when I was conducted with the cheft to the Prince. A noife foon entired. I defired Stephen to inform the Prince, that I found the cheft, and fulpected it was his filver plate: That, as I was a stranger, had I parted with it, and if any thing had been loft, I might have most innocently fuffered in character at least : That what was in it I knew not, but was certain nothing was loft fince it was in my poffettion. I faid, (for the adjutant had been complaining grievoufly, as if I had threatened to fhoot him,) that it was very true I had laid my carrabine on my knee, the manner in which I frequently travelled, but did not threaten him, tho' I was uncertain what might have happened, had he offered force : That I was determined to be as obliging to all the officers, and all men, as lay in my power : That I never would defignedly affront or difablige any of them; but, at fame time, I was every whit as unwilling to take affronts : 1 hat, by my inftructions from the College of Medicine, I was ordered to be under his Excellency's orders; and that I fhould receive orders from no other, unlefs o-Y therways therways directed by the Medicine Chancery. At this the Prince feemed very well pleafed.

The tables were turned. Balotnicoff imagined that I would be at once difgraced; but this day began a mutual kindnefs betwixt this good Prince and me, which continued ever after. He happened to afk me, How I came fo foon to be acquainted with Ruffian vocables? for, tho' I could not keep up converfation in the Ruffian language, I had learned many vocables. I told him, and produced a vocabulary in Latin and Rufs; at this he expreffed great fatisfaction in Latin; but after this, even after I had made great progrefs in underftanding and promptly fpeaking the Ruffian language, he fpoke with me feldom in any other language than Latin.

He now gave me, not only a general invitation to his table, but inforced it as my duty, during the reft of our journey to Taverhoff, and ordered me always to fit near himfelf for the conveniency of difcourfe. This was a terrible blow to Balotnicoff. I thought he would have burft with infignificant malice. By this means the Prince came to be made acquainted with Captain Carrabine's difpute, and his reafons for fending me, fo much contrary to common fenfe, and the intereft of the fick in Taverhoff, as Mr Burman was unable to attend them.

After

After this I keenly cultivated the love of all the officers, except Balotnicoff, whom I avowedly defpifed ; and indeed, he at laft was ridiculed and defpifed by the whole command. He was a gentleman by birth, but poor, had no education, and therefore was made a cooper to the fleet by Peter the Great. His cafe had been, two years by paft, reprefented to the Prince, who, by his intereft, got him made a midfhipman, which is of equal rank to lieutenant in the army.

We now travelled on, without any thing remarkable happening, till we arrived at Senkoff on the river Afkol. The weather here had been mild, and during the winter but little fnow, which, by the influence of the fun, was faft melting, fo that in many places there was none. We here propos'd to fell our fledges, and take to carts, but the Coffacks would give nothing for them worth our acceptance. They alfo informed us, that, further on, we would have very deep fnow. Upon this the Prince ordered us to lash our fledges upon carts, which the Coffacks procured, with an additional number of horfes. Thus equipped, we marched on, not fo much afraid of the Tartars as formerly.

We for many miles paffed over little hills and large vallies. After refreshing ourselves and horses at a wood in the night-time, we proceeded, and in the morning went up by a very easy ascent of some versts, a rising ground, ground, from the top of which we diffeovered, at about four or five verils diffance, the beautiful town called Kamenka, fituated in the mid lle of a very extensive plain, upon the banks of the Afkol; the defcent from this height was very fleep. The Prince was foremost, our engineer immediately before me, and three writers in a fledge mounted on a cart, were a confiderable way behind me. We had proceeded but a little way down the hill, when I was alarmed with an excellive noife from the writers cart. Looking about, I faw that their horfe had taken fright, and was galloping directly upon me. My driver could but only clear the way, when they pafied my wheels very near, and, their driver having fallen from his feat, their horfe overturned the engineer's cart and horfe, whereby it was all broke to pieces.

It affected me much to fee at once three writers and our engineer lying motionlefs on the ground. I went to them, and, upon enquiry, found that they were only extremely frightened; but the engineer lay flill on the ground like another Hercules, as he was a remarkably big man. He could not fpeak, but groaned. I caufed Mr Bowman bleed him inftantly, put him into my cart, and drove on to Kamenka, where every thing was done for his recovery, agreeable to the art of furgery. He recovered very well, nor did he ever forget my care, and my readily yielding my cart to him, gained me good will from the whole command: And the good Prince returned me thanks publicly, for what I would, in the like circumftances, have done to my enemy, as I told them.

We met with nothing worth relating after this, till we arrived in Taverhoff, but I muftacquaint the reader, that the city of Ribna is the moft beautiful I faw in the Ukraine. It is large, and has fix or feven churches. The laft day of our travels was a continued thaw, which obliged me to walk on foot more than 10 verfts. At laft, about eight o'clock at night, I arrived on the 15th of January, having travelled 776 verfts in ten days.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

What happened after my Arrival in Taverhoff, &c.

NOT being able to get lodgings, though fatigued and wet, I went to the Prince, with whom were many officers, and my old acquaintance Captain Carrabine among the reft

The Prince no fooner faw me, than, having been informed of the caufe of my delay, he ordered Carrabine to give me a lodging with Mr Burman the furgeon; and, at fame time, made enquiry at him about the reafon 174

fon of fending me to Kotchatoff, when he was well affured, that he (the Prince) was foon to return to Taverhoff ; How he durft demand medicines, which he knew were defined for another command ? &c. In fhort, the Prince fpoke a long while concerning his undue attention to the Empreis's intereft, and, confequently, his acting contrary to the Imperial mandate; his defign to miflead a ftranger, and laftly, his want of humanity, in fending a young man, who knew nothing of the roads, and could not fpeak the language, threatening to take his foldier from him, who was granted by the admiralty, into a country, not only bordering on, but daily fkirmifhing, with the enemy.

He alfo observed, that Captain Carrabine was an old officer, confequently the more culpable, and that, in fhort, he did not know how he could difpense with passing unnoticed fuch very groß faults. Here he ended his difcourfe, and, immediately after, a piece of Ruffian humiliation began, which I had never feen before. The poor captain fell on his knees, confeffed that all was true that the Prince had faid, put him in mind that he was a gentleman, and laftly, begged, for Chrift's fake, that he would pardon him this time, affuring him, that he never would again give caufe for the like reproof. Thus Carrabine's high fpirit was brought low, to the most pitiful degree.

The Ruffians are ftrongly attached to their religion and cuftoms. If a crime is any way pardonable, the delinquent will fcarcely mifs the aniwer of his supplication, if he asks it for the fake of Chrift, St Nicolas, the Emperor, or Empress. Prince Golitzin could not ftand out against this fubmisfive way of asking, and his fake for whom he asked it. He did not let him remain long on his knees, but took him up, embraced, and pardoned him fincerely, I believe, what he had acted contrary to himfelf; obferving, that I had it in my power to reprefent whatever difficulties I might meet with, to the Medicine-chancery, the members of which, ufually, as he well knew, having always accefs to the Emprefs, made but very little difficulty, not only of reprefenting their affairs to all the fuperior colleges, but effectually to inforce justice to be done to their dependents. He told him, that he had received a letter from his good friend Dr Fisher, the archiator, (in answer to one he had wrote him, intreating him to fend a well qualified furgeon, to take care of him and his command) in which he affured him, it was his opinion, that the Prince would thank him for the man he had fent, altho' he was then ignorant of the language, that he doubted not, when he was abfent from his countrymen, that he would foon learn the Ruffian language. He faid a great deal more, which I shall not here repeat.

Captain

Captain Carrabine knew that every word the Prince had faid was true; therefore defired in English, that I would forget any thing he had acted difagreeable to me. I took him by the hand, gave him a hearty shake, and affured him, that, if ever an opportunity offered, in which I could be of fervice to him, he would experience my fincere readiness to oblige him. Thus ended this important affair.

Captain Hertzenbergh, a Dane, Lieutenants Every, Smallman and Luggar, Englishmen, came and welcomed me to Taverhoff. They had been upon the Afophian fea, or Palus Mceotis, last fummer, and were ordered, with 5 or 600 failors, to come to Taverhoff, and had arrived there, whilft I was in my way to Kotchatoff. It is easy to any one, who has been fome months without feeing a countryman, to imagine how glad I was, fo unexpectedly, to meet them. I forgot that I was tired, and, at Captain Hertzenbergh's invitation, we went to his houfe, and enjoyed ourfelves very agreeably till bed-time. Captain Hertzenbergh had learned the theory and practice of navigation in England, and indeed flowed me as much kindness as my countrymen, or any other could do. Two days after this, Captain Hertzenbergh came to my lodging, before I was out of bed, and obferving, that I flept on my bed laced upon chairs, afked the reafon of this. I told him, that Mr Burman Burman had no fpare bedftead but one, and that a furgeon, who was in poffession of it before I arrived, was troubled with the itch, a difeafe I did not like ; and that, if the fummer was once fet in, I would fleep in a tent. The captain waited till I had dreffed myfelf, and invited me to breakfast with him. He then let me fee a finall room he had next his bed-chamber, and a feparate door by which I could go in or come out at pleafure, without diffurbing him. He faid, if I would accept of it, it would be fo far from being inconvenient to him, that he would take it very kindly, and think himfelf obliged. I had no objection to his offer, and, in an inftant, my bed and all my baggage was transported to Captain Hertzenbergh's houfe.

I fhall just mention two or three anecdotes which happened this fummer, and then proceed to more interefting fubjects. Thefe officers were ordered here to affift the Prince in getting veffels ready against the fummer, which was fast advancing. The Prince iffued out orders to the governors of Veronits, Cafan, and Kiove, to fend, without lofs of time, their complement of peafants, to cut down timber in the neighbouring woods, to carry it to Taverhoff and Icorits. No lefs than 30,000 peafants were employed. It may appear to every one very ridiculous to caufe veffels of 60 or 70 tons burden to be built with new felled timber ; but how ridiculous foever Z foever fuch orders may appear to an intelligent reader, it was really fact; and it is incredible, with what expedition a number of thefe veffels were got ready againft May and the beginning of June, and were carried to Afoph with the fwelling of the Don, which always happens about this time, from the melting of the fnow covering fuch immenfe tracts of land.

The confequence was, that the failors had enough a-do to keep them fwimming. In fhort, they were obliged to cork the feams every day during fummer ; and, though we were most fuccessful against the Turks by land, we were as unfucefsful by fea : For, whereas we could fend to the Afophian fea only fuch veffels as thefe, capable to carry four or five, or at most fix finall cannon, the Palus Mccotis was covered with large Turkish veffels carrying · 60 or 70 great cannon ; and it was confidently reported, that these veffels were directed by French mafters and gunners. In fhort, these veffels frequently fell into the hands of the Turks. The reader probably will afk, To what fervice fuch veffels could be useful? The defign of them was only to transport ammunition and provisions for the army under the orders of the late Field Marshal Count Lacy, which fometimes they effected, but never returned all to Afoph in fafety.

Another fleet of this kind was defined for the army, under the command of Count Muinich, who acted on the weft fide of the Dneiper; but indeed neither was of great ufe, as will appear, when I relate the progress of our arms against the Turks.

Mr Smallman was a good natured quiet perfon, and, I believe, would not willingly have quarrelled with any man. He had been, fince the year 1736, miferably reduced by the obstinacy of a difease, and though he had been under the care of eminent men; yet, as he was obliged every fummer to fail into the Palus Mceotis, before his arrival in Taverhoff, he was again in a worfe condition than before he fet out. I had this winter cured him. He was but recovered, and in a very weak frate, when the reft of our countrymen were ordered, with all their men, to repair to Afoph; but Smallman was kept by my atteflation, declaring, that, till he recovered ftrength, he could do no duty : That at prefent he was unable to perform fuch a journey, and that it would rifk his life to no purpofe. This, I afterwards was informed, was very difagreeable to the haughty Bredal, their infignificant admiral, as will be related.

One day as we were in the citadel of Taverhoff, a brother lieutenant of his in the fleet, enquired of Smallman, Where he learned the first rudiments of navigation ? Smallman anfwered, That he was bound apprentice to the coal-fhips which ply betwixt Newcastle and London, and afterwards ferved in the royal navy. navy. Mr Paveloff, for that was the other lieutenant's name, wanted no more than to turn this into ridicule, and indeed was bearing hard upon Mr Smallman, when I faid, that I was no failor, but that I had heard it often afferted by the moft knowing people in thefe affairs in Great Britain, that failors bred in the coal-trade were effeemed the beft and hardieft, poffibly in the world; and that certainly the Ruffian admiralty knew this well, elfe they never would have engaged Mr Smallman in the Imperial fervice. In fhort, Paveloff anfwered, that as I was no failor, he did not direct his difcourfe to me, and only wanted to talk with Smallman,

Mr Paveloff was very rich, vain, proud, and overbearing; and I observed that he wanted to make Mr Smallman a butt to his vanity. It went to my heart to be prefent, and fee a good natured countryman made the game of a vain empty fellow (for Scots, English, and Irish, are all countrymen abroad.) I begged of Mr Smallman, as he loved his country, his countrymen prefent, and his honour, to fuffer him no longer, to call him afide, and let him know, that he would have him either to alk pardon immediately, or elfe to affure him, that he would take the first opportunity of doing himfelf juflice; and, if needful, I affured him, he fhould not want a fecond. Smallman did fo, and the confequence was, Payeloff alked pardon, don, which effectually turned a great laugh against him, even by his countrymen. He fuipected that I was the caufe, (lipoke in Eng+ lifh) and as I was but of finall growth, young. and had, at that time, more the appearance of a confirmptive perfon than any thing elfe, as I was exercifing myfelf in a very immoderate fit of laughter, he, unexpectedly enough, collared me, and, without great difficulty, I believe as in jeft however, threw me on the ground : I had also got fast hold of him, and held fo faft, that he fell over me down the fide of the hill, (for it was a rifing ground where this happened, and we were on the very top; at the bottom of which were fome old docks, where Peter the Great used to launch his new built veffels:) I had no intention to ftop the diversion, nor was I in the smallest degree angry, efpecially as I was dreffed in an ordinary green frock, and he in his uniform, richly mounted with broad gold lace; fo I very nimbly flew over him, but, ftill holding faft, tho' he would have been difengaged, I brought him again over me, and thus we tumbled down to the dock, where we were both bedaubed from head to foot. At rifing. as we were out of hearing of the by-ftanders. I affured him, that I looked upon him as a fcoundrel, and would embrace the very first fafe opportunity of chaftifing him as fuch. However, tho' his cloaths were not only rendered ufelefs with naftinefs, but in many places places torn, yet he affected to treat all that had happened as a joke, and took his friends to witnefs, it could be nothing elfe. By their interposition then, a reconciliation was made, and, to confirm it, he entertained us with a few bottles of wine. Indeed, thro' the whole farce, I had enough a-do to look any way ferious, frequently burfting out into involuntary laughs.

Soon after the departure of our countrymen, Captain Carrabine was difinified to St Petersburgh, and one Captain Rusellus, a German, appointed as captain of the port in his place.

Concerning what happened to the Author by Admiral Bredal, &c.

IN the month of February, Bredal arrived in Veronits, and fent word to the captain of the port to provide him a lodging in Taverhoff. Rufelius ordered me to evacuate my quarters. Capt. Hertzenbergh not only had left me his houfe, but a very confiderable quantity of wood for fuel, which Bredal would have undoubtedly burnt. I, confidering myfelf as not under the directions of the port, returned however my compliments to the captain, who was truly a good man. Inftead Inftead of obeying his orders, I defired my fervant to yoke my horfe in the fledge: While he was doing this, I fecured, by barring and locking, all the entries into this great house, and then drove into the defart for an airing, where I remained long enough to give Rufelius and his admiral time to adjust their affairs, and, when late, returned to Mr Burman, difiniffed my fervant to go home to take care of the houfe. At Mr Burman's I was told by the admiral's furgeon, that the admiral was very angry that I flopped Smallman, and that he was determined to have a fecond vifitation, in order to carry him along with him : That I had now again incurred his difpleafure, by not evacuating the houfe, according to Rufelius's order; and that, as he had great need of men of my profession, he had heard him fay, he would require me by an unanfwerable memorial to Prince Golitzin, fhewing him his cafe, and the impoffibility of being provided any other way ; whereas the Prince had many chances of furgeons paffing either to the fleet or armies.

In anfwer to this, efpecially as I knew this furgeon was to fup with Bredal that night, I told him, that Mr Rufelius and I, I hoped, would not difagree about my leaving the houfe, when he was fenfible of the caufe: That Mr Burman and I jointly had attefted Smallman, and that if Bredal, after fuch atteftation.

teflation, took him, though warranted by the atteflation of others, I would immediately lodge in the Medicine Chancery a proteft, and another in the admiralty, in the flrongeft terms. I faid that my inftructions from the Medicine Chancery, and corroborated by inftructions from the board of admiralty, who, he ought to know, never attempted to contradict the defign of the Chancery in medical affairs, bore that I fhould with all poffible expedition make my repair to Prince Golitzin, and there to take care of his health, and of those under his immediate command.

I faid, I was furprited that any vice-admiral was fo thoughtlefs as to imagine any perfon, who had the finalleft title to common fenfe, would run the rifque of difobeying inftructions from his principal conflituents, in favours of a man abfolutely under their orders, and of a perfon, of whom he knows nothing. That I fhould not hefitate to fpeak the fame language, and fomething more to the admiral, if he urged any fuch matter; and, in fhort, tho' Prince Golitzin was ever fo willing to oblige Admiral Bredal, in this I would obey neither the one nor the other, till they procured me new orders from the Medicine Chancery.

As I faid before, a dark cloud hovered over the Prince, and this made him, tho' naturally a quiet good man, fubmit to many liberties, which men, in no fhape equal to him, at this time frequently took. I was certain that what I had faid would be agreeable to the Prince, efpecially as I took the blame of refulal to myfelf; the two German furgeons flared at my reafoning, acknowledged the truth of our being only under the direction of the Medicine Chancery, but faid that the admiral, was he to hear fuch difcourfe, might do me a great injury; becaufe at fuch diftance, his power was very great, and his connections with the admiralty and Medicine Chancery might be alfo great. That he was, they had reafon to believe, alfo a very invective man, and that people greatly fuperior to me in rank, durft not take the liberty to withstand his orders, though not frictly agreeable to the regulations.

I only replied, that I was born in a land of liberty, and was refolved to fpeak the language of my heart ; and that fo long as I did my duty to her Majefty, and was determined to act up to the meaning of the regulations, to which I was ftrictly bound by my oath; therefore I was certain that no admiral could greatly moleft me, if I continued to purfue this way. I faid much more which I fhall not, for brevity's fake, mention ; but, as I expected, and indeed, defigned, the admiral's furgeon at fupper told him every word, and probably more. The auditory expressed great furprize, as they faid, at my impudence: But the admiral, tho' a Dane, Aa had been long on board British men of war, where he learned his principles of navigation, and likewife, the lengths that Britifh. people will go, when hardly uted, faid nothing but bit his lips, and his acquaintances faid it was a fign of difpleafure. Next morning I waited upon my Prince, who feemed to be diffurbed : He told me that Bredal, for whom he had not the finalleft regard, had infilled to take me with him, &c. I in return, acquainted him of our difcourfe laft night, and of my reafons for faying that I would not go even if the Prince ordered me. As none were prefent, he faid, I had told what was true, and, in fome rapture, threw his morning gown about me, which was a fign of great fatisfaction. He however ordered that I fhould make my appearance before Bredal, and advifed, that I might moderate my paffion ; becaufe it might, fome time or other, lie in his power to do me an injury. I accordingly went into a great hall where the admiral was flanding with a number of his minions about him : As I was very neatly dreffed, he eyed me: Capt. Ruffelius told him who I was, and as an anfwer, he gave a nod. I remained about a quarter of an hour fpeaking to my acquaintances : At laft, I made my bow, and went off, not ill pleafed that I had no opportunity of making a wider breach, and when I confider the important air, and pride which he clumfily enough affumed, affumed, I imagine he was as glad to be quit of me.

As this haughty man was determined to carry fome of his propofals against fuch a diminutive antagonist as me, and as it was the only one remaining, orders were iffued to re-vifit Mr Smallman, and his own furgeon was to be one of the judges. I shall not here take up my reader's time, nor tire his patience about medical controverfies in this affair, against the admiral and his furgeon only, that I affured him, he diffuonoured his place in the Empreis's fervice, either in acting according as Bredal would have him, or elle, he evidently betrayed his ignorance, in alledging it was fafe and poffible for a man to do what he was truly not able to perform, or that he run no rifque of his life, to make a journey of betwixt 7 and 800 verfts, at fucha feafon, confidering the dangerous courfe he had just undergone, and the prefent feeble and weak condition he was brought to. I told him, it was not enough for him to think to get protection from fuch a head as his admiral's : He ought to be fure, that he acted according to principles of the medical inftitutions agreed upon by the beft mafters, and particularly, according to the faithful obfervations of the most honourable authors in the profession ; that a deliberate action against the truths they afferted, was an acknowledgement of ignorance. I faid, I was acquainted Freat with with the Archiator, and that he knew me : that I durft fay, Mr Burman was a man of more integrity and experience than to join with him: But that fuppoling he fhould, it would rather ftimulate, than difcourage me to reprefent the affair more effectually; and that if Mr Smallman fhould lofe his life after fuch fair admonition, he and his admiral was most justly answerable to her Majefty, for fuch an indirect ftep, contrary to the tenure of Peter the Great's regulations, and that I would immediately lay my complaint before the Cantoir in Taverhoff, enjoining them to acquaint his admiral with it, before he left Taverhoff, that he might not plead ignorance; that laftly, the Empreis had too great a love for justice, to let fuch crimes escape punifiment ; a furprising privilege truly, allowed to great men and judges, thro' many principalities in Europe ! Wherever this happens to be the cafe, who can help thinking, if they dare not fpeak their minds, that fuch a flate is ruled by madmen, or abfolute fools ! I fhall, for inftance, fuppofe that a man obnoxious to a great man, had inadvertently in anger, threatened another, this other aftewards happened to come to an untimely death, by an unknown hand; the man, who formerly had inadvertently threatened him, was feized, thrown into jail, tried and condemned to be hanged, and pofitively was hanged, only by the power of a great great man of neither honour, honefty, nor real good judgment: And fuch a cafe has been difcovered afterwards by the very author of the murder, either from a diffurbed confcience, or from a defire before he left this world to do justice to the relations of the perfon, who had innocently been led to the altar as the victim of a wrong-headed great man.

In fhort, my former declaration concerning Mr Smallman, was a fecond time confirmed by the admiral's own furgeon, tho' very contrary to his inclination : But the fear of being exposed, tried and degraded, preponderated with him for once to defert the warm injunctions of his empty headed admiral, and indeed, I did not part with him, till he was fenfible enough of the poor pitiful opinion I entertained of his admiral and himfelf, which was, in a very fhort time after this, fully evidenced to be very well founded, as will be faithfully related in its proper place. His furgeon advifed me to go along with him and Mr Burman to deliver our report: This I declined for many reafons. Thus we parted, nor did I ever fee either of them after this, fo that what I have wrote cannot be referred to any other motive, than a natural antipathy I ever had, and continue to bear against all fuch base men ; nor did I ever hefitate to declare my opinion either to them

A geographical description of the province of Veronits, its capital, and a natural history of this country.

THE metropolis of the province of Veronits bears the fame name, and lies almost fouth-fouth-east from the city of Mofcow, distant from Taverhoff 10 versts. The city of Veronits is built upon the fouth fide of a hill, and the river Veronits washes the fouth fide of the city. Upon the top of the hill is a citadel furrounded with a dry ditch, fortified with palifadoes, it is a place of no great strength: In it, the archbishop has his palace, and there are fome churches. The whole city is encompassed with a dry ditch and rampart with palifadoes. It is faid to contain about 6000 inhabitants : The governor's palace and courts of justice are all built at the foot of the hill*. The province

* At a diffance from the city, especially to the fouth upon many hills and high grounds, the inhabitants, in former times; probably before the Ukraine was peopled, formed rickles of flones, or cones of earth where centinels were placed with tar barrels or other combuftibles, to give notice to the cities and countries of the approach of the of Veronits has the province of Mofcow on the north. Bielogorod and Kiove provinces on the weft; Little Tartary on the fouth : Penziníkoi, Sinbiríkoi and part of the kingdom of Aftrachan on the eaft. In 47 degrees 10 minutes north latitude on the fouth, by 63 degrees 45 minutes east longitude, on the east by 54 degrees three minutes, on the north, and by 54 degrees 10 minutes east longitude on the weft. A great part of the Ukraine is fubject to the provinces of Veronits and Kiove. The province of Veronits is very justly reckoned a natural, rich and fertile country, there are indeed many great defarts in it, only from want of water, for on brooks and rivers are many very large and populous cities and villages; excepting its fouthermost borders in Little Tartary on the Don, which, though a rich pleafant country, does not feem to be well inhabited : This proceeds, I fulpect from their fear of the Crim Tartars; for, unlefs a colony of warlike men forms and fortifies a town at once, there can be no fafety for a few inhabiting the open country, as no manner of truft is to be put in the Crim Tartars, nor indeed in their protectors, the Turks. Taverhoff lies fouth weft

the enemy. These are still remaining, as with us in Scotland, and I was informed, that in sufficious times, two horsemen were appointed by each of these, who, when they perceived any confiderable body of men travelling from the enemy's country, immediately set fire to the combustibles, and made their repair to places of strength.

west from the city Veronits, built by Peter the Great on the fouth banks of the river Veronits, which runs into the Don at the difrance of about two verfts from Taverhoff. Two thirds of Taverhoff are furrounded by the rivers Don and Veronits. The low flat grounds are covered over with thick woods and lakes, after the floods of May and June are over, which, I prefume, makes Taverhoff very unhealthy. About mid-way betwixt Veronits and Taverhoff, Peter made a long, ftrong, high dyke, with a lock in it, for confining the waters of Veronits, in order to float the fhips he built there. He made another of the fame materials, but much ftronger and higher, upon the Don, three miles from Taverhoff. The dyke alone is more than two verfts in length, and has two fluices in it; by the help of which great locks, it is almost incredible, what a depth of water he affembled, by which he launched fhips of war of 70 guns, fome of which I have feen still preferved in Taverhoff; and by this conflux of water, he carried thefe great fhips to Afoph; which, when the last peace was made with the Turks, in his life time, were again, by the fame care and art, brought back to Taverhoff, laid up on dry ground, and fhades built over them, I fuppofe only to perpetuate the memory of that great Emperor.

Taverhoff is built very regularly, with the ftreets interfecting one another at right angles, all

all of wood : A fine palace ftands on the weft end of the town, with good gardens, where the Prince lived, built of the fame materials. The fort lies to the weft of this, in which every thing neceffary for thip-building, and magazines of all forts, are kept. The citadel is made of earthen ramparts palifadoed, with baftions at the corners, (it being an exact fquare) mounted with cannon. To the west of this, is a village inhabited by 3000 foldiers, for the fafety of the place. Taverhoff is inhabited only by failors, and a few fifhermen. I prefume this policy is not bad, becaufe the fame fpirit of envy takes place in Ruffia, as in many other nations, betwixt foldiers and failors. They never can agree, for in St Petersburgh, though under the immediate difcipline of the fupreme government, their animofity was fo ftrong, that, in my time, the guards and failors have fought, notwithstanding fevere orders to the contrary, pitched battles, where fome on both fides have been flain : At laft, however, they were reftrained from this by the Empress Anne.

Certainly the province of Veronits is one of the most plentiful countries in the world, comprehending great part of the Ukraine; for the numbers of our armies and fleet, altogether acting against the Turks, with an army for the protection of the Ukraine, were no lefs than 150,000; add to these 40 or 50,000 peafants employed in the different works of ship-building, all which were supplied with provisions from the provinces of Veronits and Kiove, nor did I ever learn, that any provision was brought from any other province of Ruffia into this, during the whole war; yet, for all this, I have known an ox bought for a ruble; a large fow, killed and eleaned, for 3s. 6d. a goole or turkey 2d. or at most 3 d. a hen I d. and fo forth. I have often bought a bag of oats, equal to four bushels Winchester measure, for about 3s. 6d. Large magazines of provisions, during the war, were kept in many fortified cities in this province, always in good order, fo that the army, when on the Ukraine, never fuffered the finallest want of any thing.

The defarts, when they are watered with a few flowers of rain in the fummer, produce grafs in abundance. The banks of the rivers are like gardens, producing many vegetables, which we, with all our art, can fcarcely cultivate in ours. Hops and Sparrowgrafs grow luxuriantly every where; their apples are not good; pears, from which we have made, for a mere trifle, the beft perry I ever tafted, grow wild; great variety of the medicinal plants, ufed in the apothecaries flops, grow Galy by the richnefs of the foil.

The rivers afford food and all conveniency to different kinds of water-fowl, fuch as fwans, different forts of geefe and ducks, fnipes, &c. The defart produces heath-fowl of different kinds, buftards, cranes, partridges, quails, quails, &e. Quadrupeds, harts, feveral forts of deer, wild fwine not very plentiful, hares. wolves, foxes, bears, and a very beautiful animal. called by the natives furks, which burrow under ground, and live far from any inhabited place, are of a brown colour, fomething like a lap-dog, but have large eyes and whilkers, and only four large teeth in the fore part of their mouths, are excellively fat, fit at or near their holes, and, when they fee any man, whiftle very loud two or three times, then retire. They live as it were in colonies, for they are always found in large bands. The rivers and lakes are full of very fine fifth, fuch as flurgeon, flirlet, pike, tench, perch, carp, &c. In fhort, nothing is wanted to make Veronits the happiest country in the world, but liberty and mild government ! What is in the bowels of the earth, I know not, for the inhabitants, having no need of any thing more than what nature has fo plentifully provided for them, feek after nothing elfe. wetching . Concerning the Russian and Turkish War, from the Year 1736, till the latter End of the Year 1739.

DURING the two years I staid in Taver-hoff, I had many opportunities of being informed concerning the operations of our armies and fleets, by gentlemen who had been eve-witneffes. I fhall, however, for brevity's fake, only give a general relation of what happened every fummer, without entering into very many, though brave, petty actions. Mighty empires, it is well known, like children, quarrel, and agree again after they are tired. They are both in the right, and both in the wrong; as this is often the cafe. I shall not fay whether the Russians or Turks were in the wrong, but fo it was, war was declared by the Ruffians against the Turks and Tartars in 1736, and two armies were ordered to act immediately. The first fet out under the command of the brave Count Muinich, who, without lofs of time, laid fiege to Afoph, where he loft a great number of brave men, nor could he take the city. Another army was getting ready by the wife, the humane, the brave Count Lacy. Thefe two great men were both field-marshals in the armies mies of Ruffia. They were both great experienced generals, but their characters are different. Count Muinich was a German from Heffenhumburg, an intrepid, bold man, but endeavoured to carry all his enterprifes at once ; he therefore had no notion of fparing even his own men. Count Lacy, under whofe immediate orders I ferved two years, was an Irifh gentleman. He was at the fiege of Limrick, and followed King James VII. to France : He ferved the Emperor of Germany, and at laft the Empire of Ruffia : He was at the famous battle of Narva, and many have told me, that it was owing to that gentleman that the whole Ruffian army was not cut to pieces; for he wifely deftroyed the roads, fo that the victorious Charles could not pafs. The univerfal character he bore in the Ruffian army, by all ranks of men, joined to what I have faid, is, that, when he commanded the army, he never fought a battle, but he was victorious ; he never laid fiege to any place that he did take.

At the fiege of Dantzick, they commanded by turns every week. After they had made 1500 French prifoners, it was determined in a council of war, to chaftife the citizens for galling the Ruffians with their artillery from the walls, during their action with the French, who had taken protection under the walls of Dantzick. The marfhals agreed that the citizens fhould be chaftifed, but they differed differed far in the manner of attack. Count Muinich wanted to fcale the walls inftantly, defpifing fuch a neft of burghers; but the wary Count Lacy was against this, on account of the great loss of men which must necessarily be the confequence, in fo much that he protested against the council of war, and never would command with Muinich after this.

His advice was foon verified, for, although they foon made themfelves mafters of the city, it was with the lofs of 15,000 men. Count Muinich, as I faid before, had loft a great number of his beft troops before Afoph, nor had he made the finalleft impression on the city; for these reasons, the Court of Petersburgh ordered Count Lacy to take the command of Muinich's troops, and Muinich to march against the Pericop.

As Count Lacy was marching with the utmoft expedition alongft the Don, efforted only by a few Coffacks and barbarous Kalmucks, part of the Kalmucks ftole his horfes, giving out that they were ftolen by a party of the Crim Tartars. The marfhal being in the defart, could not proceed, fent the remaining Kalmucks in queft of his horfes, promifing them their value if they were recovered. In fhort, his horfes were returned quite fatigued, and the Kalmucks received their reward according to the marfhal's promife; but afterwards their villany was different, and they were glad to return the money to preferve their lives.

lives. When Count Lacy had taken a view of the city, he caufed new works to be made, and the artillery, especially the mortars, to be placed, fo as to reach their great powder magazine; at fame time he ordered two large praams to be flationed under the walls of the city. By this change of operations, the greateft powder magazine was blown up by a bomb, which, as was reported, deftroyed at least one third of the city, upon which the Turks delivered it up, with the cannon, mortars, and ammunition remaining, but agreed to transport as many Turks as chused to go to the Crim, with their proper effects, and this he did with great exactness. Count Muinich destroyed the Pericop, fent many prifoners to Peterfburgh*, and thefe operations concluded the campaign this year.

The Operations of the Armies in the Year 1737-

E ARLY this fummer, as General Leflie, a gentlemen of Scots extraction, was, with a fmall body of men, paffing from one part of the Ukraine to another, he was attacked by a large body of Tartars. It was faid, that he fent off expresses immediately, to a German, Major-General Heim, at no great diftance, who, had he been willing, might eafily have relieved that brave man. General Leflie encouraged his men not to deliver themfelves up prifoners, but die like men; which accordingly happened. The Tartars got fome fpoil, but did not make one prifoner: Some alledged, that his fon was made prifoner, but if fo, he was certainly mortally wounded, for he was never heard of, and, had he been alive, the Tartars would have preferved him for ranfom. Heim was fhot to death, for neglect of duty.

General Lacy marched from the Ukraine, with an army not exceeding 40,000 regular troops, but a confiderable body of Coffacks and Kalmucks joined this army, paffed the Rotten Sea, or Guiloi More, upon a bridge of boats, beat the Turks and Tarcars where ever they met them, returned to the Ukraine loaded with honour, fpoils, and many prifoners*. Count

* I cannot pass by the operations of a finall flotilla of Ruffian boats, acting on the Palus Mœotis this year. They carried fome ammunition and provisions for the army under Count Lacy's orders, as they were returning back to Afoph. One of them, commanded by a French gentleman, L'Efremery, firuck upon a fand-bank. The Turks obferved it, and cannonaded it very brikly, being far from the reft, and not protected by the army. The brave L'Efremery laid trains to blow up his vessel, then he fent all his men ashore, to make their escape to the reft of the fleet, which was at fome distance. The Turks having filenced L'Efremery, and having observed the men making their retreat

Count Muinich marched from Kiove with a regular army, confifting of 40,000 troops. and many thousands of irregulars, paffed the Borifthenes, not far from Kiove, upon pontoons, and, in his march towards Otchakoff, drove with great flaughter all his enemies before him into the city of Otchakoff, (called in other books Oczacow.) An admiral was ordered to attend this army with a fleet of finall craft, loaded with provisions; but (it was faid, through fear of a Turkish fleet lying opposite to Otchakoff) he did not come up in time. The defart was covered over with great plenty of grafs, but it was withered and quite dried up, by the continued drought, which frequently happens in thefe countries, at that time of the year. The Ruffians no fooner had arrived in the neighbourhood of Otchakoff, than the Tartars let fire to the grafs in the defart. The Ruffians were obliged, to preferve their camp, to fet fire to the grafs round it, that the two fires, meeting at a great distance from the camp, might be the lefs troublefome to the army, and dangerous to their magazines of powder. The confequence of this was, that there was no grafs left for the cavalry, but what grew on the banks of the river ; add to treat by land, fent feveral boats to bring off the veffel; when L'Efremery obferved the veffel full of Turks, he fet fire to the train, and blew up his veffel, himfelf, and a good number of his enemies.

202 VOYAGES AND

this misfortune, that the flotilla, with provifions for the army, was not arrived, nor could the marshal get the least account of it.

Upon this, a council of war being fummoned, they were nearly unanimous to retire. In councils of war, the youngeft conftantly fpeaks first, and the marshal gives his opinion last of all. The memorable brave General Keith, being fecond in command, advifed them, that it was abfolutely impossible to retire, without the help of their flotilla, that if this advice was attempted, they muft kill all their horfes, lofe their artillery, and deftroy their ammunition and baggage; becaufe there was no forage remaining ; that there was not provision for the army, even at fhort allowance, for above fix or feven days ; that, laftly, it was his opinion, the attack of the city fhould not be delayed, and pointed out the manner of attacking it, offering his fervice to command in the most dangerous place, tho', by his being fecond in command, this offer was irregular.

The field-marfhal agreed to his advice, plan, and method: Some faid, that though Muinich loved Keith, yet he was furely jealous of his growing greatnefs, as he was the darling of the whole army, both regular and irregular. From whatever motive it happened, the Count adhered to General Keith's advice, and, in the night-time, a body of veterans were lodged in an old Turkifh redoubt, which which lay upon the banks of the river, and at break of day, Gen. Keith led a body of 2 or 4000 men into the dry foffa which furrounded the city, which brought the greatest part of the braveft Turks to that fide, they fearing that the Ruffians would feale the walls immediately. Whilft the befieged were in the greateft confternation, and bringing their braveft force against the marshal, who had time to play his mortars and cannon from the proper places agreed upon, and was foon wounded in the knee with a mulquet-ball. However, he gave orders never to leave the attack till the city furrendered, which, he affured them, would very foon happen, and then was carried to the camp by fix granadiers. About this time, as was expected, a large body of Spahis rufhed out of the eaft gate, paffed by the old redoubt before mentioned, and attacked the Ruffian camp; but it was too well fortified by the chevaux de frife, cannon, and finall arms, for them to make the leaft impression upon it. Upon this, the regulars rushed out, and, at the very first at tack, the men formerly mentioned, lodged in the old redoubt, made very dreadful flaughter from behind, and, about this very time, a large bomb broke through their great magazine, which blew it up, with great part of the city. The Spahis, being fo hotly handled, fled with great precipitation, and in the greatest confusion, running the gauntlet, as they paffed fed by the old redoubt, the Caffocks, and others, entered the gate with them, bravely maintained their poft, and kept the gate open, till greater numbers coming in, maftered it and the city.

In public foreign papers it was faid, that the Ruffians befieged it four days; but the account I have given, I believe to be true, as I had it from gentlemen who were prefent; and, though the Ruffians might have been before it four days, yet, I'm perfuaded, the city was taken on the very fame day in which the first attack was made. Be that as it will, a very terrible maffacre enfued. The Turks continued obstinate, and many Ruffians were flain, which fo incenfed the victors, that, for fome time, they killed every living Turk they met with, fparing neither men, women, nor children.

Tho' my intention is to make my relation very fhort, yet I cannot help mentioning two brave actions performed by a countryman from Aberdeen, as I was informed, whofe name was Innes. Mr Innes, lieutenant in the Horfe Guards, afked, and obtained leave, from the Emprefs, to ferve under Count Muinich, as a volunteer. He was riding at a finall diftance before the field-marfhal, but in his view, through the ftreets of Otchakoff. No doubt the officers were much grieved to fee the foldiers fo mad, that they, at other times most obedient, would not defift defift from their butchery. Innes called to a granadier of the Guards, who was barbaroufly exposing a Turkish child, which he had just pierced with his bayonet, and, in a ridiculous manner, was bafely diverting himfelf with the agonies of the poor little innocent. Innes, determined to put a flop to fuch barbarity, reproved the granadier in very harfh words : The granadier, as I faid, mad with rage, threw the infant from him, and, forgetting all duty, made his way to Innes, who; far from deferting the unequal challenge, received him, put his bayonet afide, (for the fellow intended to have flabbed him) and, at one blow levered his head from his body; another foldier, with great indignation, feeing how Mr Innes had ferved his friend, made at him with his fcrewed bayonet alfo, but met with the very fame fate. The fieldmarshal, being an eye witness of Innes's bravery, greatly commended him. This encouraged fome other officers, who foon thereafter got the foldiers brought to a fense of their duty.

With no finall fatigue they had become mafters of the whole city, except one baftion, where fome hundreds of Janizaries had lodged: They were determined to maintain that place with the greateft obftinacy, firing, and throwing granades at all the Ruffians who went near them. The field-marfhal, though he had barricaded all the avenues to them, and rendered rendered their escape impossible, yet was uncafy, that fuch a number of deliperate men ftill held out, nor did he think that he was mafter of the city, until they were in his power. He therefore gave orders to bring up the artillery, to deftroy them. Mr Innes pitied the fate of fo many brave enemies : He observed. that the Turks only had fired at men in arms, and the furious heat of their paffion was alfo by this time much abated. The Turks had a way by which they used to draw up their artillery to the top of the baftion. Mr Innes faid to his comerades, that he would take thefe Turks prifoners, providing the Ruffians could be reftrained from firing upon them as they came down, They diffuaded him from fo dangerous an undertaking ; but he anfwered. that he would do it, or die in the attempt, and, fheathing his fword, he rode calmly up to the enemy, amongst whom he cipied a pretty youth, of about 15 or 16 years of age. When he came near him, he alighted from his horfe, and, taking this youth to be their commander, who indeed was fo, approached him in a refpectable, though foldier-like manner, called out, Ne bols, which fignifics, Don't fear. Then he put him in mind of the dangerous fituation they were in, of the field-marfhal's defigns, defiring them to obferve the hafte the Ruffians were in to bring up their artillery, and affured them, that he had rifked his own life to fave theirs; and that if they

they would march along with him, he would pawn his life and honour, that the field-marfhal, who loved, and effeemed brave men. tho' enemies, would treat them as respectfully as they could expect, providing they behaved with becoming moderation. This difcourfe charmed them, and accordingly they went along with him, and laid their arms at the field-marshal's feet, who carreffed the boy, and kept him always at his own table. Some faid, that he was the governor's fon, others, that he was fon of the Khan of the Crim Tartars. The boy faid, that it was the barbarity of the Ruffians which forced them to take the refolution of fighting to the laft man. When every thing was quiet, and proper order again eftablished, the marshal returned Mr Innes thanks, at the fame time, conflituted him lieutenant-colonel of a regiment of horfe, and not fatisfied with this, in his report to the Emprefs, he did not forget to make honourable mention of him, and that he had granted him the highest commission which was in the power of a Ruffian fieldmarshal to bestow. By the return of the courier, the Empress dispatched a commission to be filled up by the field-marshal, appointing Mr Innes colonel of dragoons.

Every thing being now accomplifhed according to Count Muinich's wifhes, he appointed Major-general Stoffeln governor of Otchakoff, with 12,000 good men, and returned turned loaded with victory, honour and riches. It was faid, that fome of the Coffacks filled, and carried home their caps full of gold; and, undoubtedly, the irregulars got great booty, but the regular troops have it not in their power, as they dare not abfent themfelves from their colours : Thus ended the memorable actions of the year 1737.

The Operations of the Armies in the Year 1738.

A DMIRAL Bredal was ordered to get his fleet of fmall craft ready early, that Count Lacy's operations might not be retarded for want of provisions and ammunition. This was the reafon that the failors with their officers made fo fhort a ftay at Taverhoff. An order from the admiralty had been fent to Bredal, to caufe found the bar at Aloph, to fee if it were poffible for fhips of fome force to get over it. The admiral reported, that it was impoffible to get over the bar with larger veffels than thefe already in ufe, and ufed all his art to perfuade the few British there, to fubmit to the fame opinion ; but Capt. Kenzie, Lieutenants Leflie, Every, and Smallman. were of another opinion, protefted against the admiral's plan, and fent a report of the foundings, fubfcribed by them all, which they had had carefully taken. They alledged that it was pollible to build veffels fit to carry 20, or even 30 guns: That, if they were provided with a fufficient number of fuch veffels, they would not only be in a condition to protect their transports, but did not doubt to give a very good account of the Turkish fleet, notwithstanding the largencis of their ships, or the number of their cannon.

Thus there affairs, undetermined by the admiralty, remained when admiral Bredal returned this year to Aroph ; nor had the Ruffians one fhip or veffel which could carry more than fix finall pleces, four or fix pounders each, which were not able to engage fhips of 70 great guns, of which the Turks had a great number. This inequality of veffels, and difcord among the fea-officers, was the true caufe of all the misfortunes which befel them this fummer.

In fhort, a fleet, as I was informed by officers belonging to it, was early enough got ready, and Lieutenant Every, an excellent failor, was difpatched as commander of one of thefe little fhips, or rather covered boats, to bring advice to Bredal, Whether any Turkifh fleet was to be feen in the Palus Mœotis? Mr Every, it feens, performed that piece of fervice to the fatisfaction of every perfon, except the admiral, who defigning he fhould fall into the hands of the Turks, and being difappointed, was determined to opprefs him D d right or wrong. He accordingly fummoned the officers of the fleet, and, when affembled. let them know, that Mr Every there prefent, had not performed his voyage according to the meaning of his inftructions. The admiral produced a report, with day-books, fuch as fea-officers keep, giving an account of his failings, foundings, the bays and promontories, which Mr Every had feen in his voyage; and laftly, that on fuch a day and hour, he Every had feen, from his top-maft-head, a large fleet of Turkish veffels, upon which he inftantly changed his courfe, and returned with all diligence. The midfhipmen, and others, under Every's command, being examined. faid, that Mr Every's books and obfervations were very exact, but denied that they had feen the Turkish fleet. Mr Every faid, that he had acted up to the meaning of his instructions : That he had acquitted himfelf as an experienced failor, which would be proved by the fleet when they failed out : That, as the inftructions were given to him alone, he was not obliged to fhew them to any under his command, and that it would have been contrary to the regulations, and to good fense, so to have done.

He likewife plainly told the admiral, that, when he took his leave of him, he Bredal enjoined him to fpeak of the defign of his failing to none, which Bredal denied. Mr Every faid, that if the admiral had intended, that any number under his order ought to have witneffed his having feen the Turkifh fleet, he ought to have given it as part of his inflructions; and laftly, that as he was the principal commander, and intrufted with the whole expedition, his report and word of honour ought to gain credit. Bredal's council of officers, however, would not blame Mr Every ; but the proud admiral, without lofs of time, ordered the fleet to fail, openly defpifing Every's report, giving out that he did not believe there was any Turkifh fleet in that fea.

any

In this, however, he was deceived, and a finall fhare of prudence and good fense might have convinced him that either the Turkifh fleet would early put to fea this year, or that in fo many thousand Turks, there were none who had power and judgment enough to prevent the Ruffian boats from doing them probably more mifchief than they did in the year 1737; for had it not been for the finall flotilla, Marshal Lacy never could have paffed his armies into the Crim by the Guiloi More. The Ruffian flotilla failed, directing their course west towards the Crims, steering as near the northern fhore as they could, and founding frequently. They at laft arrived at a promontory, from which neigbourhood Mr Every had reported that he had difcovered the Turks. None were here feen, and the admiral exulted greatly. Every faid, that he had DETE had no orders to advise the Turks to wait in this place ; but that he very probably would fee them before they reached the Guiloi More. The provident admiral was fo very fecure, that he ordered the flotilla to drop anchor during the night time, in the bottom of a deep bay about 300 verits diftant from Azoph. Next morning, the weather was fo hazy, that they could not fee a cable's length before them : About II o'clock A. M. the air cleared up, which difcovered the whole Turkish fleet in the mouth of the bay, hemming in the Ruffians. They were not idle, their great guns reached the flotilla; and in fhort the bravest Ruffian, that is to fay the admiral, and a few of his elect, were first afhore, and happy were they who gained it. I was not informed of any great lols of men on our fide, but I was well informed that the Ruffians deftroyed their own fleet by finking and burning it; and in fhort, rendered every thing ufeleis to the Turks. The Ruffians caft an entrenchment, and mounted a few cannon alhore; nor durft the Turks land to attack them. A memorable incident happened at this time, which I cannot pals by in filence; it was this: The entrenchment was not finished, when the brave admiral fent for fome of the principal captains, acquainting them that he was taken very ill, and as there was no proper medicines in the defart, he determined to go for help by land to Azoph, and

and therefore he would be glad that they would accompany him. Captain Kenzy flatly refused, telling him that he was refolved to remain, live, or bravely die with those under his command: The admiral however went off, drawn by oxen, accompanied by fome of his friends, and left the distressed failors and a few foldiers to Brigadier Lukine, a far better commander.

The brigadier, having rendered every thing ufeleis to the Turks, decamped and took a few finall cannon and ammunition with him. drawn by the cattle they had brought with them for fresh provision. The brigadier, a Ruffian gentleman, by his good deportment, had gained not only the efteem of the few foldiers, but of all the failors and their officers. His conduct and bravery was well known to them all, and glad they were of the change. They had not travelled 100 verfts, till about 10 o'clock A. M. they fpied a great dust in the defart, approaching towards them. Lukine ordered the failors to take the charge of the cannon, and formed the finall army into what is called by them, Battalia de Carrie, the fame, I fuppofe, which we term hollow fquare. In this order, they had not marched long, till they difcovered about 6000 Turkish horse well appointed, making all the hafte they could to get up to them. The brigadier gave flort but clear orders, which were well observed. In short. the the Turks bravely advanced without order. faccording to their cuftom, when they defpite the finall number of enemies) to the very points of our bayonets: When, the fignal being given, immediately began a regular fire platoon-ways from the fquares, intersperfed with hand granades, whilft the finall cannon raked them every way, fo that they were foon weary of this drubbing, and rode off. rather fafter than they had approached, leaving fome hundred horfe in the field for ufe, which our poor men had much need of. A very few of our men were wounded ; for the Turks were fo foon put into confusion, that the affair was over in about half an hour. and indeed it is worth remarking, that one midflipman only was killed by a cannon ball, during this amphibious expedition.

After this, they proceeded to Azoph without any other hindrance. No hiftory, I am perfuaded, can give an account of fuch another military affair: An admiral, under pretence of ficknefs, left his command, and artived, drawn with oxen, with a few of his own kidney, and his failors bravely equipped on horfeback!

Quid faciant leges ubi fola pecunia regnat, Et ubi paupertas vincere nulla potest?

faid, was protected at that time by the most formidable Duke of Courland.

At their arrival in Azoph, all was in comfusion: The admiral's conduct was highly centured by the British, who spoke their minds too freely to the admiral's face. The admiral was justly blameable by all forts of people, but they fpoke with refpect. The British were blamed only for imprudently telling the admiral that he was a coward, and ought not to command brave men. A courtmartial was ordered to proceed against them, which was composed of the admiral's friends, and it was refolved that Captain Kenzie and George Leffie fhould be difinified the Empress's fervice, and fent out of the Empire without an honourable difcharge, or paffport: That Lieutenants Every and Smallman thould fuffer death. I had an early account of all these proceedings the enfuing winter from three fea officers, who, at the fame time, delivered me a letter from Lieutenant George Leflie, and a pacquet of letters, in which, one was directed to Mr Rowndaux the Britifh refident at St Peterfburgh, another to -Count Golovine, one to Mr Bell of Antermony, and one to Mr George Napier merchant there, pointing out the most unjust and barbarous proceedings of the admiral, and defiring only that, by their means, the Empress might be acquainted with it, fo as juffice might be done to them.

I could

I could do nothing without the help of Prince Golitzin; and therefore, without lois of time, acquainted him: He defired that I would not mention my having fpoken to him, or to any perfon, but that he would that very night difpatch for St Reterfburgh the acuteft courier in Taverhoff, and faid, that I might take my measures accordingly, with great fecrecy. I fent for the courier immediately; he faid, that at, or near Mofcow, a party of foldiers was stationed on purpose ftrictly to examine all paffengers, for fear of the plague, which raged at this time with great devastation in the Ukraine, and that although it would be afcertained that Taverhoff was quite free, yet they certainly took all letters from private people, and burnt them. I put a piece of money into his hand, and affured him that I would be more generous when he brought me an anfwer that the packet was received in St Peterfburgh. He took my money, and ingenioufly made a hole in the thick fole of his fledge, in which he concealed the packet, and fo was carried fafely to Peterfburgh : Upon which. an order was difpatched to Bredal, commanding him to fend his prifoners to the admiralty, where I shall leave them, and proceed.

CHAP. XLIII.

A continuation of the success of the Russian Army.

I N the beginning of March, a great body of Turks and Tartars defigned to make an eruption into the Ukraine, of which Lieutenant General Count Douglafs having had certain notice, laid wait for them. They, defpifing his finall army, attacked him with their wonted fury, but were feverely drubbed, loft a great many thoufand men killed on the fpot, had many prifoners taken, and the Khan's great ftandard fell into his hands.

The next operation worth notice, is the fiege of Otchakoff, by a body of about 80,000 Turks and Tartars: Major General Stoffeln was commander in the city ; he was left with 12,000 regular troops last year, by the army under the command of Count Muinich; but the plague raged in the garrifon with great violence through the whole winter, which had carried off upwards of 6000 men, the remaining were, many of them confined to the hofpital, and daily dying in great numbers. He therefore, for the benefit of fresh air, had ordered the garrifon to encamp in the neighbourhood of the city, except fo many as neceffarily were obliged to mount Ee guard 2 guard in and upon the walls. When they were in this deplorable fituation, fome of his irregulars, who had been fent to fcour the defart, brought him certain advice, that a very confiderable army were marching towards Otchakoff. He without delay beat to arms, and every thing was immediately in the beft order he could contrive. I was affured by his fon, and other officers, that foldiers, who could not ftand half an hour at once. mounted the walls. In fhort, the Turkifh army befieged them vigoroufly three days without intermillion, to little purpofe, tho', had they known the deplorable condition the garrifon was in, it is probable they would not have given it over : They left near one half of their army dead under the walls, which the garrison, (almost exhausted) threw into the Borifthenes. The plague raged with more violence than ever, both here and in Kinburn: This obliged the Ruffians to deftroy these ftrong cities, and retire to the Ukraine.

The famous Donduk Ambo was the righteous Prince of the Kalmucks; the Empreis Anne, however, placed another, by the name of Donduk Dafhee, over the Kalmucks at the death of their laft Prince. Donduk Ambo would not fubmit to yield up what he thought his right by lineal defcent. The greateft part of the Kalmuck nation joined him, and being afraid to live in the defarts of Aftrachan their native country, they fled to Cuban Tartary, fituated on the fourth fide of the Palus Mœotis, and put themfelves under the protection of the Grand Signior. four or five years before the war broke out. Donduk Ambo did not like his new protector, nor yet the Tartars of Cuban. At the beginning of the war, he would not affift the Turks against the Russians; but let our generals know, that, notwithstanding what had paffed betwixt the Court of Petersburgh and him, if the Empress would permit him to live in peace in Aftrachan, and reign over the Kalmucks, he would affift the Ruffian arms with 40, or even 60,000 brave men : This was agreed to, and prefents fent from the Empress to Donduk Ambo confirmed this agreement; amongft other prefents, the Empress fent him two finall beautiful brafs cannon of two or three pounders, and a fine fcymitar, with the hilt of gold, richly fet with precious stones. The Cuban Tartars had been troublefome to him during his flay amongst them ; but when he departed to the defarts of Aftrachan, they purfued him, until he had the wifhed for opportunity of trying the metal of his fcymitar, which he did to effectually, that he almost extirpated all the fighting men in their country, and returned to the defarts, (after having fent fome thousands of his men to the affiftance of Marshal Lacy) with innumerable herds herds of the Cuban cattle. I fhall give a further account of him, and the notable exploits of his princefs, who was a Circaffian lady, and my patient, after Donduk Ambo's death.

Field Marshal Lacy took the field this year with a gallant army of regulars not exceeding 40,000, and many thousands of irregulars. Let it be observed once for all, that whatever our news papers have faid, and may fay, the Ruffian regular armies never exceed 40,000 regular troops : Though in the late Pruffian war, our news papers made them exceed that number, I never gave any credit to their affertion, becaufe it is altogether contrary to their rules and cuftom. I fay, Count Lacy proceeded through the defart ftraight for the Pericop, as Bredal's misfortune had difappointed him. He had not proceeded far when he was threatned by an army of about 1 20,000 Turks and Tartars. The Count ordered the regulars to form a triangle, and the irregulars to keep in the rear, and form wings to the regulars: After this manner, they proceeded to march daily, notwithflanding the enemy's great army.

At laft, the enemy proved more obflinate than formerly: Upon which, a party of irregulars went out to fkirmifh, who giving way, two or three regiments of dragoons were fent to fupport them : But, the enemy determined this day to have a general battle, they they therefore formed themfelves into the figure of a wedge, and thus, the last driving on the foremost, drove our dragoons and irregulars before them, who taking fhelter behind the army left it quite exposed. A young nobleman, a court favourite, had not only been lately made a colonel, but had leave to pick out the likelieft men from the whole army: Thus he commanded the most fightly regiment, probably in all the armies in Ruf-Ambitious of glory, he had obtained fia. the honour to defend the angle opposite to the enemy; it was this regiment the Turks gallantly attacked, and quite routed by which an open paffage was made into the center of the army. It feems, the prudent old fieldmarshal forefeeing that this might happen, had accordingly placed on each fide of this infant regiment, two old veteran colonels, with regiments proud of their honour. The one was Colonel Johnston, a Scotiman from Kenneil. The number of fcars on his body received in the wars of Ruffia, was an earneft that he was no coward. The other, as brave, was a Ruffian; neither of them could count fewer than 70 years of age. Thefe two brave men joined their regiments, and formed the angle in the midft of the Turkifh army ; their field pieces, fmall arms, granades, and bayonets, making fad havock, foon drove back those who were without, whilst these who had broken into the heart of the army army could get out no where; but, after a terrible maffacre, were forced to throw down their arms, and beg their lives upon their knees.

Colonel Johnston affured me, that 15,000 prifoners were taken, fhackled, and fent to Ruffia immediately, and it was almost impoffible to number the dead, but that he believed 15,000 more had been killed. Next day, the field-marshal, before the whole army, returned thanks to these colonels and their regiments, acknowledging, that, had it not been for their experience and bravery, the whole army would have been in the utmost danger. Old Johnston, with a foldier-like refolution, advised the marshal, to order his young unexperienced officers, for the future, to be cafed up amongst the baggage ; which, it is faid, he did not take amils.

Next day, the army marched towards the Pericop, but could not fee the enemy all that day. Two days after this, the Turks appeared at a diftance, and encamped at night within 14 verfts of our army. Thus they continued to march, till they were within two days march of the Pericop. After the Ruffian army was encamped, and every thing in quietnefs, the marfhal caufed all the dragoons mount their horfes, and leave all their incumbrance, with the greateft fecrecy, and each of them to take a foot foldier behind him. He ordered, ordered, at the break of day, on a fignal given from the army, an attack to be made upon the Turks all at once, on three different fides of their army, at which time he would be ready to fupport them with the whole army, and inftantly fend off the irregulars to their affiftance. Every thing was done according to orders, with the greateft exactnefs, the Turks and Tartars were totally routed, leaving every thing to the conquerors; many were taken prifoners, nor did the Ruffians ever fee them afterwards, till they arrived at the Pericop.

The following account of Count Lacy's actions at, and after taking Pericop, I had from John Baptift, a Capuchine Friar, the marthal's father confessor, and I believe it to be true : He faid, that, three days before the Ruffians arrived at Pericop, it had constantly blown a perfect hurricane from the weft : That, when the camp was formed, and, as foon as night came on, he privately fent for his priefts to administer the facrament to him, a cuftom he always used before he attempted any great action ; that done, with a chearfulnels very natural to him, he ordered a glafs of wine for the priefts, and recommended them to take their reft. He then inftantly caused a few of his best troops to get ready, and wait his orders ; at the fame time he ordered many pieces of cannon to play against Pericop, Pericop, and all the drums and mufic in the army to make as much noife as poffible.

He then mounted his horfe, and rode off with the cavalry formerly mentioned, ftraight to the gut of water on the east end of Pericop, part of that called Guiloi More, and went quite through it, on a hard bottom, nor was it deep. (The Turks had before this given out, that it was bottomlefs, which gained fo much credit, that the Ruffians never had attempted to pass it till that night.) The field-marshal finding the bottom hard, returned, ordered all the regular army to be got ready, except 12,000 men, with the irregulars, drums, and mufic, which he left with orders not to move from their camp, nor leave off firing and making every other poffible alarm, during the darkness of the night. In the meantime, the marshal was fo diligent, that he fafely marched the army and artillery through that water, without the eneny's having the leaft fuspicion of it; further, that the terrible fire from three batteries (which he had made in fuch hurry in the night-time, againft the fouth and weakeft fide of the Pericop) carried the first news of the Russian army's being there. Notwithstanding the great furprife the Turks were in, they held out till noon, when their walls being demolifhed. and the Ruffians making ready for a general affault, they furrendered themfelves priloners of war, and that very afternoon were fhackled, led, pinioned, and fent off to Ruffia. After this, the Count marched through all the low country, burnt Bacciefiray, called by the Ruffians Buchfhezeray, and Caffa, with many other towns of finaller note; blew up the Pericop, and returned loaded with fpoils, prifoners and honour, and a very great number of fine brafs and other cannon. I faw fome of them with the Imperial arms of Germany upon them.

Thus the Pericop was taken, with the lofs of very few men, by the experience and wifdom of one man, which had formerly coft the Ruffians, each time they attempted it, many thoufand brave men; add to this, that at this time the northern walls of Pericop were much more regular and ftrong, than ever they had been before the fiege.

A Continuation of the Success of the Russian Arms.

COUNT Muinich marched his army thro' the defarts bordering upon Poland, from the Borifthenes to the river Niefter, notwithftanding armies of Turks and Tartars, triple his number, and all their diligence to obftruct his march daily. He was five times attacked in formed battles, and beat them each F f time, with no great lofs on his fide, but with terrible havock of his enemics.

It was late in the year before he could gain the banks of the Niefter, and, when there, he would have rifked much, to have, at that time, attempted to force a paffage, fo far from help, had he not fucceeded ; therefore he returned through the fouthern provinces of Poland, loaded with honour. There are a kind of Coffacks, which the Ruffians call Zaporogs; they inhabit iflands in the river Borifthenes, amongst the falls, which makes it extremely hazardous for any enemy to attack them. They are a neft of robbers, and fometimes were under the protection of the Turks, but now are under the Ruffian government. Thefe are nothing like the Ukraine Coffacks. They have no wives, nor allow of any women in their islands, but have plenty on the banks of the rivers. They compare themfelves to the Knights of Malta, by being confantly at war with the Turks and Tartars; that is to fay, they live by rapine, tho' profelling the Christian religion, and therefore. have a prieft or two, are the deferters, villainous fcum, and outlaws of all the neighbouring nations. They have laws among themfelves, and fubmit to a kind of magistracy, but what these laws are, I presume few know; and indeed it is probable, they are fo volatile. that there can no trust be put in them, their principal glory and proteffion being to defiroy ftroy mankind. It is true, they feldom are taken prifoners, becaufe they neither take nor give quarter, and, I'm told, that they take fome fuch oath, before they can be admitted into the community, for they have every thing in common.

The most daring and barbarous amongst them are called Buggateers, which is a title all the Tartar nations give to heroes.

They pretend to fight only against the Turks; but I fhrewdly fulpect, that they make inroads into Poland, at fuch times affuming the name of Haydmaks, whole abominable cruelties we frequently are made acquainted with in the news-papers. They form a good barrier betwixt the Tartars inhabiting the weft of the Borifthenes and the Ukraine ; for if their flocks or herds come within their reach, they commonly kill the people who feed them, drive off the cattle, and fell them to the Polifh, Ruffian, or Ukraine borderers.

Complaints had been brought laft year, to Count Muinich, that fundry inroads had been made by fome of his irregulars into the fouthern provinces of Poland; wherefore, this year, when the whole army was affembled on the weftern banks of the Borifthenes, before they began to march, the count ordered proclamation to be made, that whoever made any inroads into the kingdom of Poland, flould be punished with death. endideuro on ale Though

Though none could plead ignorance of thefe orders, yet the army had fearcely marched four days, when complaints, well authorifed by one of the Polifh voivades, were received, declaring, that a finall number of Zaporogi had burnt two or three villages to the ground, murdered many of the inhabitants, and carried off all their cattle.

The field-marshal immediately made strict enquiry into this affair, and found it clearly proved, that two of the Zaporogi chief Buggateers were guilty, whom he ordered instantly to be hanged, little regarding the most ferious follicitations which their friends made to spare their lives, who, at the fame time, offered the count an immense fum of money, if he would, but for this once, spare them. This year they had sent 6000 men to the affission of the Russians, but fit ding that they would be allowed only to act against the enemy, they, in a few days after this execution, withdrew, and retired to their islands.

CHAP. XLVI.

Concerning the Success of the Russian Arms in the Year 1739.

L AST year the Crim Tartars had been fo feverely handled by Count Lacy, that they made no eruptions into the Ukraine this winter, winter, and indeed I believe the greatest number of men able to bear arms, were either killed in battle, or made prifoners. However, the Turks fupplied them with all the help they could fpare during the winter feafon ; for they had great reafon to fear, that the Ruffians would conquer the whole Crim or Crimea, which, if they had done, would have proved most dangerous to the Turkish empire : For, if ever the Ruffians can mafter Jenicala and Taman, which command the ifthmus leading into the Palus Mccotis, they will effectually protect a fafe navigation thro' that fea ; and if their fleet fhould prove fuperior to that of the Turks, nothing can hinder their failing to Conftantinople. This I take to be one reafon why the Turks are fo much afraid of the Ruffians having a fleet on these feas, and that they conftantly deny them this liberty, by making it one of the principal articles of peace.

Donduk Ambo began early to fill the Cuban country with dreadful devaftations; not contented with their herds and flocks, he killed or took prifoners all the Cubans who were found in arms; but, tho' the Ukraine was, by the fuperior talents and care of our victorious generals, fecured from the inroads of the enemy, the plague made great havock, which fhall be taken notice of in its proper place. This was the caufe of our marfhal's leading out their armies fooner than formerly; and, tho' tho' they could not march till the fnow was gone, and the defarts covered with grafs, they encamped far from inhabited places.

Count Lacy marched about the beginning of June, as formerly : He foon made himfelf mafter of Pericop, and marched to the fouthern parts of the Crim; but, though he met with no confiderable force to obstruct his operations, he could proceed no further, because Bredal (either from the confusion his whole command was in, or from the fright he was put into last year, or from the want of fufficient veffels) was not in condition to bring either ammunition or provisions for the army, and the Crim Tartars fo effectually concealed their grain, that none could be got fufficient to maintain one regiment, tho' they got fome cattle. Add to this, that, though, as I faid before, the Tartars and Turks durft not give battle, yet in narrow defiles they galled our army from the heights, where neither the dragoons nor irregulars could purfue them. However, he caufed burn the towns and cities to the ground, in the countries through which he paffed, that the enemy might have other employment, during the winter, than making inroads into the Ukraine. When he had diffreffed their country as much as poffible, he returned early into the Ukraine, but two or three regiments had contracted the plague, and were therefore oblito unit mancol.

A Continuation of the Success of the Russian Arms under the Orders of Count Muinich.

At the time when Mr G

THE following narration I had from gentlemen in the army, who were eye-witneffes of whatever happened. Upon the 5th or 6th of June, the count marched with his victorious army, well apppointed, ftraight to Chotzim, commonly called Choczim, without meeting with any thing very extraordinary. He carried with him a good train of artillery, befides field-pieces, and arrived on the banks of the river Knifkoffke about the 20th inft. In the march two accidents happened, which, altho' they feem may trifling to fome, may be agreeable to others, and therefore I fhall relate them.

A lieutenant-general was loft in the defart, nor could any notice be got of him during the march of the army to Chotzim. The other was Captain Gray, born in Pruffia of Englifh parents, a good officer, and an excellent engineer. The field-marfhal ordered him to give directions for placing pontoons over the rivers, and regulating the transportation of the battering cannon, great mortars, and other 232 VOYAGES AND other heavy carriages. This captain was in very great friendship with a French gendeman, whole name I have forgot. The French captain was extremely good natured, lively, and gave himfelf very little trouble to think of weighty matters, or to forefee what misfortunes might happen by the loss of a little time, even when engaged in the most ferious affairs. At the time when Mr Gray was bringing down a large piece of cannon from a fleep bank, which, if not managed with great fkill, would not only have killed many of the horfes, but might either have run into the river and be loft, or probably deftroy the pontoons, upon which, I fuppofe, the fafety of the army did not a little depend. Be that as it will, when Captain Gray was in the greateft anxiety about the fafety of the cannon, his friend, the Frenchman, addreffed him with troublefome importunity about trifling affairs. Gray, after he had once or twice defired him to defift for that time, at laft, in a paffion, uttered fome words in German, rather harfh, and the Frenchman not knowing the meaning of them, alked fome other of his acquaintances, who, in a ludicrous manner, informed him. After the artillery was carried fafely over, and the army in march, the Frenchman challenged Gray to give him fatisfaction. As nothing elfe would do, they retired privately into a neighbouring wood, and there fatisfied themfelves by wounding each other. None

None of their wounds proved mortal, but the anxiety of the one for the fafety of the other, was the caufe of a confultation of furgeons, and thus it became public.

The premier major of their regiment was an old unpolified Ruffian. He carried a report of the affair to all his fuperiors, at laft to Count Muinich, complaining, that two officers had acted against the regulations ; that, according to his duty, he had complained of it to all his fuperiors, from his lieutenant-colonel upwards regularly to his Excellency, and demanded, that, without lois of time, this affair might be enquired into by a courtmartial. The marshal defired the major to defift from fuch profecution, which the major flatly refuled, for many reasons. Upon this, the marshal kept the report, and difinified him, without letting him know what he intended to do. The count next fent for the officers, examined them hunfelf, and defired, that they would, without reftraint, tell him the truth. They did fo, but with this remarkable difference, that each endeavoured to perfuade the marshal, that he only was guilty, and that his antagonift was innocent. The marshal foon learned how the affair flood. admired their fentiments of honour, and recommended them to moderate their paffion for the future, thinking a few hours before they came to extremes; and then difinified them in a most affectionate manner.

Next morning early, their major and they were fent for to the count's tent. They had not waited long when he appeared, and delivered a commission to each of the captains, conftituting them majors for their honourable fervices, and then he gave the major an order to proceed from the army to Oranburgh, with expreffes to its governor; and that as he was not young, he should there officiate as a garrifon-major, till further orders. This was a bitter dofe, but death would have followed difobedience. Thus this wrong-headed man, by his foolifh obflinacy, was obliged inftantly to march a-Ione through many defarts, most of them infefted with the enemy, to the diffance of near 2000 miles, and become a garrifon-major, and probably with the hopes of no fudden advancement.

During this march, we were frequently in view of the enemy, who were triple our number; but, having been defeated five different times laft year, with great flaughter on their fide, and a very inconfiderable lofs on ours, it feemed that they now defigned to rifk all in a decifive battle near Chotzim; and, notwithflanding their great lofs laft year, they feemed to be certain, that, without great difficulty, they would extirpate this gallant army, which had beaten them fo frequently; for they drew up all their forces on the other fide the river Niefter, and gave the Ruffians no moleflation whatever, though they knew that the the Russians intended to befiege the firong fortress of Chotzin, from which place they were distant only about fix versts. The count encamped in a very low ground, having the Turkish army on the top of a high ground in front, and another army of Crim Nogas, and other Tartars, confifting of at least 100,000 men, on a hill to our left. The Turkish army, it was faid by many, confifted of 20,000 Janizaries, and 60 or 70,000 Spahis. The Ruffians took the pontoons from the river, and brought them among the baggage. At midnight, the marshal fent off, with the greateft fecrecy, 500 of our best granadiers, under the command of chosen captains, to a gullet in the hill, to the left of the Turkish army, with orders to ly concealed, till a fignal, by throwing up a rocket, fhould warn them to act according to the orders they had received.

Next morning the Ruffians were all in a ftir, and, after prayers, they marched with their field-pieces, and fome finall mortars, chiefly drawn by men; for the hill in fome places rendered the horfes ufelefs. Thus they directed their march towards the right, and advanced till the marfhal imagined the Turkifh cannon might hurt them. The Turks, not doubting that the Ruffians intended to gain the top of the hill there, had affembled all their Janizaries and beft troops; but they were foon undeceived, when they faw them fuddenly march with great diligence immediately ately under the top of the hill to the left, towards the place where the granadiers were concealed. This unexpected movement put them into great diforder; for they not only had expected them to mount the hill, on the fore-mentioned place, with their best troops, but had pointed their largeft cannon that way, which were placed on carriages without wheels, fo that they were rendered almost ufelefs on this occafion. Add to this, that the Turkish camp was open near to where the granadiers were placed, that their horfe might readily march out and in as need required. In their hurry they advanced to the very place where the granadiers were, and then the fignal was given, when they played their part fo well, that our field-pieces and mortars gained the top of the hill ; with these the Turkish cannon were immediately deferted, and indeed proved of no manner of use to them during the action.

Now, every where among the Turks there was nothing but death and confusion; their camp was fet on fire in various places; our cannon, finall arms, and granades, made fad havock in front, whilft the bombs were burning and burfting in their camp and rear. After they had loft three-fourths of their Janizaries, they fled in fuch confusion, that none entered Chotzim. The Tartars made fome feeble attempts upon our camp, but never came up in time to help the Turks; and, and, it was faid, they advifed them to throw every heavy thing away, alledging, that our irregulars, who were quite fresh, would foon be with them: Whether the Turks followed their advice, is uncertain, but it is certain, that they threw much away, fome of which our troops got, but their own Tartars got much more.

One anecdote is very remarkable. The prieft of a regiment got on horfeback, with a large brafs crofs in his hand, and rode with the foremoft of the foldiers, encouraging them to follow the crofs, affuring them, that no hurt could happen to them who did fo. It is certain, that this prieft was not wounded; and it is as certain, that he was nobly rewarded by the Emprefs; though it is no lefs evident, that thefe gallant troops needed no fuch encouragement. It is alfo very dubious, whether many very learned men would venture, fo implicitly, as to truft to the fingular favour of heaven, amidft the found of fo many thoufand and thundering meffengers of death?

THE victorious army had now little elfe to do, but to march to Chotzim, and demand the gates to be opened : They did. fo: The ferafkier indeed required fome hours to deliberate, and confult with his friends, what was fafe and honourable to be done. However, the answer Count Muinich returned was difagreeable and determined, viz. " You shall yourself bring the keys in half an hour ; if you exceed that time, not one of the garrifon shall escape death." Thus spoke Count Muinich! and at fame time ordered the artillery to be brought forward in all hafte. However, he needed not have been in fuch a hurry, for the Turks had great reason to know him well, and did not doubt the veracity of his threats : Therefore the ferafkier, without delay, offered up the keys, with the whole garrifon at his back, who, with the reft of their countrymen and foldiers, were immediately fhackled and fent off to Kiove, under the orders of Lieutenant-general Byron.

In this city of Chotzim, it was faid, great treafures were got ; and warlike ammunition of all forts, were found in the greatest abundance, and no lefs than 300 brafs cannon mounted, befides other pieces. I have been likewife informed, that here they found their lieutenant-general, whofe name I fhall not mention, left it should disoblige a good antient Ruffian family. The general, no doubt, was glad to be reftored, as he thought, to his liberty, congratulated the victorious marshal, and returned him thanks for being the inftrument of his relief : But this fevere disciplinarian answered him, that, according to the regulations of war, he ought to have taken better care of himfelf than he had done, and not have exposed to respectable a character as a lieutenant-general to be taken prifoner in fuch a manner. He put him in mind, that he ought not to have gone to reconnoitre the enemy, without a certain refpectable number of cholen troops, to protect him from falling into their hands.

Therefore the marfhal remanded him back to prifon, till a court-martial fhould determine his fate, which was inftantly ordered to fit. By their fentence, agreeable to the Ruffian articles of war, it was determined, he had forfeited all his military honour, and therefore he was declared a dragoon, till the Emprefs's pleafure fhould be known. The fentence was juft, and agreeable to the articles of war, therefore no favour could be granted; none was afked, fubmiffion took place, and he was obliged 240 obliged inftantly to officiate as other dragoons, though he was a gentleman of large poffelfions, and one of the principal reprefentatives of a very antient family in Ruffia. All the favour he alked of the count was, that he might have liberty to have his unfortunate ftate reprefented, without loss of time, to the Court. This was granted, and he dispatched one of his trufty fervants to St Petersburgh in August, at which time this affair happened. I faw him enter Veronits with 40 or 50 attendants, in November following, in his way to St Petersburgh, tho' only a dragoon.

The foldiers upon duty at the gates of the city paid him no refpect, which indeed was right, and agreeable to the articles of war; but I was grieved to hear them fay, that now, notwithstanding his great riches, he was only their brother, viz. a dragoon. However, he did not long remain in this station, for he was foon appointed governor of the kingdom of Kazan.

Having thus got poffeffion of this ftrong place, Wallachia and Moldavia having no troops to defend them, were at the mercy of the count; but the greateft part of the inhabitants, being Christians of the Greek profeffion, needed no compulsion. They were told, and no doubt believed, that, at last, the Ruffians were come to free all the Christians in Greece from the heavy Turkish yoke. Thus the field-marshal made an easy conquest as far as the banks of the Danube. Some of our news-papers faid, that he conquered Bender. but this is a miftake, as he never pointed that way, well knowing, that if the war went on, he, next fummer, could fix himfelf fo firmly in these provinces, that all the different people on the east would fubmit, without great trouble. It was confidently reported, and I believe it to be true, that Count Muinich defired only 20,000 regular troops to be added to these he already commanded, early in the fummer 1740, and that he made no doubt of putting her Majefty in poffession of Confantinople ; but all thefe grand fehemes and expectations fuddenly dropped, by an order from Petersburgh, giving an account that the Emperor of Germany had made peace with the Turks, and that the Ruffians had acceded to the fame, and therefore requiring that the count fhould evacuate all that country, and return into Ruffia with all diligence. CORDS

as

He vifited the capital of Wallachia, and carried off all the cannon. In Chotzim, Jaffy, the Turkifh camp, and on the road, they got no fewer than 800 cannon, befides mortars,  $\oint c$ . These were all brought to Chotzim; but, when the count received the above mentioned order, he was at a loss what to do with fo many brass cannon. He at last determined to fell them to Jewish merchants from Poland, and was content to take at the rate of  $1\frac{1}{2}d$ . H h

menco lis codi suo

per lib. only the Jews were obliged to get them broken at their own expence.

Thus this war ended, it feems, to the mutiral fatisfaction of both nations, but to both their great lofs; for altho' the Ruffians were every where victorious, and had conquered Wallachia, Moldavia, and all the countries lying betwixt them and the Borifthenes; tho' they every fummer gave laws to the Crim, and kept or deftroyed many of their ftrong places, while their diffreffed inhabitants were glad to fly to the mountains; tho' they had almost totally extirpated the inhabitants of Cuban, taken and deftroyed Afoph, Pericop, Otchakoff, Chotzim, and many other cities; and laftly, tho' they had defeated the Turkifh armies at all times, with incredible flaughter, and had fent into Ruffia innumerable thoufands of prifoners, and brought home very great riches ; yet, by the peace, moft of their conquests were given up.

If now we balance their loffes, we may have a juft idea of the truth of what I faid above. By the peace they got fome more defart to the weft of the river Borifthenes and fouth of Poland, than they had formerly. Reafon, however, fhows this acquifition to be of no value to the Ruffians, who already have, in their own Empire, more uninhabited country, than, moderately fpeaking, the one half of Europe. The next and only advantage they got, was to deftroy Afoph, and render it a defart ; but then all commerce betwist twixt the two empires must be transported in Turkish vessels. It is true, that the Russians have nothing to hinder them (if another war should happen) from marching directly into Cuban.

Tho' the Ruffians did not lofe many men in battle, yet it cannot be denied, that they loft great numbers by fatigue, want of water, travelling thro' thefe fcorching defarts, and by the plague. Tho' all care was taken to keep thefe loffes fecret, yet I shall give one reason why I fay fo: The armies acting on the Ukraine and against the Turks, I compute not to have exceeded 120,000 men in all. In the year 1738 thefe armies were recruited with 50,000 men, and in the year 1739 with 100,000 men ; add to thefe, the devastation made by the plague in the Ukraine. I do not pretend to affert any number. I shall only instance Pavelofske, and a large village, diftant from it 20 verfts. In the former, I was credibly informed, that no lefs than 50,000 people died, and in the latter, which was only 10 verfts diffant from Ikorits, where Prince Golitzin commanded 30,000 men for building veffels, I was affured, that the plague carried off at leaft 20,000 men : But how inconfiderable are thefe two towns in comparison of the whole Ukraine ? In the year 1739, Dr Miniatty, who was exprefsly fent to the Ukraine, to give neceffary directions about this formidable difeafe, and infpect 244

infpect every fulpected place, made the number of dead fo incredible, that I shall not repeat what he faid, although he was a man of great veracity and honour. Add to this, that what he faid was in confidence that I should not speak of it to his prejudice, which now I do not, because he is dead.

At prefent the Ruffians have it not in their power to act against the Turks by fea, becaufe the bar at Afoph is not deep enough to float large fhips, which was the reafon that Peter the Great was at fo much expence, after he had demolifhed Afoph, in building Tagenrook. He was afterwards obliged to reftore Afoph, and fill up, and otherways render ufelefs the fine new made harbour Tagenrook, by the fatal agreement at Pruth. When a new war fhall happen betwixt them, I have fome reafon to believe, that the Ruffians will apply all their power and skill to conquer the two fides of the ifthmus leading from the Palus Mœotis into the Black Sea. If ever they thould become mafters of this, then Conftantinople will be in imminent danger, and, I imagine, the Crim will infantly beg to be their tributaries, because they can be in no fafety otherways.

If the Ruffians fhould ever get pofferfion of that ifthmus, they can bring to it fhips of as great burthen as any in Europe. They have fuch great plenty of timber growing on the banks of the Don, that they might build 10,000

10,000 fhips of the greatest force ; and, if they have good officers, the natives make excellent failors ; and, where money is, officers will not be long a-wanting. Then they may command commerce at the walls of Conftantinople, and if that should ever happen, how far it might prove beneficial to Ruffia, and fafe to our Levant company to carry their Turky trade that way, I am not politician enough to determine ; but one thing I am certain of, and that is, that there feems to be no danger from pirates in the Baltick; that the expence of carriage, if rightly managed, betwixt Peterfburgh and Taverhoff, will be very fmall, and from thence, by the Don to Afoph in barks, can be but trifling. Moreover, the Ruffians know their intereft too well, ever to be against a project, which would undoubtedly be of advantage to them in many The observations I have here made refpects. may amuse, but cannot greatly difoblige the reader. Schemes, every way more extraordinary, have been projected, and, when all difadvantages have been fully understood and known, have yet proved of fingular utility to our country.

The Ruffians can build no veffels of force upon the Dnieper or Borifthenes; becaufe it would be quite impossible to transport them through the cataracts where the Zaporogi live, and they have neither woods nor inhabitants bitants on either fide of the river, betwixt these cataracts and the Black sea.

CHAP. XLIX.

Concerning the nature of the climate, and difeafes properly endemical, with the Author's opinion of the caufes.

O make this chapter the lefs difagreeable to my readers of all kinds, I acquaint them, that I fhall enter no farther upon this fubject, than only fuperficially to touch upon what is proposed above, that it may be of some use both to people educated in the medical profession, and also to those who may travel into those parts.

About the middle of March, the weather was temperate, and continued fo till May, when the heat increafed confiderably; and June began with rain. July was more ferene, feldom any fhowers, but exceffively hot, the heat and drought increafed till the latter end of August: After that, the air was gradually colder with rain till the month of October, or beginning of November, when frost fets in. Let it be observed about the evenings, after the fun was fet, thick flinking fogs arole from the morafs and woods constantly through the whole fummer: After the high waters proceeding from the melted fnow and ice were quite quite gone, and the waters were confined within their own proper banks, and as the heat came on, a thick four appeared on the flagnating waters only, and increased with the heat and length of the fummer : in August I measured them, and, in waters furrounded with trees, I found them to measure four or five inches deep. Add to this, that in very hot calm weather, they produced a very difagreeable flinking fmell. In March, the fnow had no fooner difappeared than a thousand delightful beauties arose out of the defart, but the moraffes and low grounds were covered with waters till the middle of May 0. S. then indeed, they appeared like a very rich garden, exhibiting to our fight and fmell abundance of different flowers. Here the lily of the valley grows in fuch abundance, that I queftion if all the gardens in Britain can produce fo many as one fquare mile of Taverhoff morafs. They produce, as I faid before, many other ufeful and pleafant vegetables ; in the day time, one is charmed with the pleafant notes of finging birds, fuch as blackbirds, thrushes, larks, &c. in the night, the nightingales have frequently diverted me from fleep. June produces great, flocks of water-fowl; the end of July produces fruits, fuch as water-melons; a variety of different melons, &c. but as no gentlemen live here constantly, there are none of our European fruits cultivated. Satisfied with a few few flowers and pot-herbs, during the fhort time, they wifh to refide in fo very unhealthy a climate; health is only wanted to make Taverhoff one of the most delightful places in the world.

Endemical difeafes, the two years I refided here, did not make their appearance till the beginning of July, at which time, intermittent, remittent, flow fevers were very rife. and increased till near the end of this month, when they decreafed till the latter end of Auguft, and the remittent, flow fevers difappeared: But the regular intermittent fevers were more obstinate than before this, and fluxes of all kinds accompanied them till the beginning of October, when, as the winter drew on, they difappeard, and gave place to pleurifies, peripneumonies and inflammatory difeafes of all kinds, which alto difap-, peared when the froft was continual, and the waters were frozen over. Above, I have only fpoken of these difeases which make their appearances near a fixed time of the year. which I obferved, and noted down the very dates two years fucceffively. I was also informed, that they always raged, whether in time of war or peace, much in the fame way. but proved more obflinate and fatal to fbrangers than to inhabitants. In the hot months. malignant, putrid, petechial, eryfipelatous fevers made their appearances in the most formidable manner, during the two years I was

was there : But at the fame time, I was informed that they neither appeared with fuch violent rapidity, nor in fuch numbers in time of peace : Therefore, I do not rank them with the former, but they put on, in the 1739, fuch horrid appearances that I was uncertain if we were quite free of the plague, as will prefently appear.

In the year 1739, Mr Rofen the furgeon of the hospital, (Mr Bourman being dead) fent for me to visit the hospital. At my arrival, he told me a patient was brought from Ikorits with very uncommon fymptoms, and therefore, he had fent for me to confult what was to be done, and how we were to act. This patient, a failor, was carried into the ward where malignant putrid fevers were taken care of. He had been fick the third day, was covered all over with finall black petechie, and his tongue and mouth, as far as we could obferve, with a thick black for: his pulfe was fcarcely fometimes to be observed, at other times very irregular, with a fubfultus tendinum. He had loft all fenfes whatfoever ; his eyes were inflamed, but appeared rather of a livid than a red colour. He paffed urine and excrements without any perception. At Ikorits, he had been blooded, vomited, and his back, arms, and legs were bliftered, of which he had no manner of feeling. As the plague raged with great violence in Pavelofske and the foremen-Ii tioned tioned village, I fcrupled not, though I had never feen that difeafe, to pronounce it to be the plague: The fick man, and every thing belonging to him, was carried into a little ward, where maniacs had been formerly kept, now vacant: And as the weather was extremely warm and no wind, I ordered the windows of the fick wards to be kept open through the day, and the floors and bedcloaths of the fick to be fprinkled frequently with vinegar, and alfo morning and evening, and the wards univerfally to be well fumigated with fragrant gums, of which we were allowed great plenty.

As all hopes of recovering the patient from Ikorits were loft, I advised that drink should be frequently given him with antifeptic medicines, and that he fhould ke kept as clean as poffible ; and laftly, that the man appointed to attend him, fhould have no intercourfe either with the men in the hospital, or elfewhere in the city. I prognofficated that he would foon die, and he did fo that very day. At night, the body was carefully carried out to the defart, and buried deep in the ground: His bed, bed-cloaths, and every thing elfe belonging to him, were burnt. The people, who were appointed to do this, kept as far on the windy fide as poffible, and none were allowed to touch any thing, but the perion who had waited upon him when living, and they who brought him, were obliged to flay their their quarantine in the defart, where victuals were regularly carried to them. Three perfons were in this manner brought from Ikorits, before inftructions and orders could be fent there to prohibit this practice. They had all the fame fymptoms, were treated much in the fame manner, and they all died.

As foon as Mr Rofen and I had taken all the precautions in our power, we went to Captain Ruffelius, and acquainted him with what we had obferved, and what we had done, and hinted to him what we thought ought to be done. The captain was of opinion, that, notwithstanding the Prince at this time was not in good health, he ought to be made acquainted with every thing, because his orders would have a better effect, and would be refpected at a greater diftance. We accordingly made the Prince acquainted with it, and he immediately caufed me get ready inftructions, till directions could be procured' from the Medicine Chancery, which had forgotten to give me any about the plague. I immediately obeyed, and the Prince from this iffued out the following orders.

Mr Ruffelius immediately difpatched a fecret memorial to the governor of Veronits, requiring him to take all care of his province, and fent him a copy of the prince's orders to all immediately under his command, which were, prohibiting all people, under pain of death, to go from Taverhoff to any other city, town, or or inhabited place, without liberty from the Prince's Chancery, and likewife any people from other places to enter Taverhoff, or its dependencies; and that thefe orders might meet with all obedience without miftakes, centinels were placed about the city day and night. He required that no flefh or fifh should be made use of, till further advice ; but that, in cafe difeafed people were advifed by any of the faculty to use fuch food, it was recommended that fuch fhould ufe either vinegar, lemon-juice, or other acid vege-tables, to which they were formerly accuftomed ; that, under pain of a fevere whipping, the inhabitants fhould keep their houfes fweet and clean, open their windows through the whole day, and fprinkle their floors and bed-cloaths with vinegar; that the poor should get vinegar from the Empress's ftores.

That, if any dead animal was found in the ftreets, or any where near the houfes, the fuperintendant fhould be feverely punifhed; and that, if it could be made appear, that any, after thefe orders were publifhed, from carelefsnefs, or any other caufe, did not immediately bury all dead animals, even to the bignefs of a chicken, deep in the defart, they fhould be punifhed with the Knout ! That the priefts, who always attend burials, fhould take all care that the graves fhould be at leaft feven foot deep; that, in every ftreet, there fhould be kept day and night, pieces of fir, wet ftraw, with pitch or tar fmoaking, till further orders. Their times of working, althletick exercifes, and other diversions, were alfo regulated.

The fame orders were fent to Ikorits, with thefe only differences, that it was firicity ordered they fhould fend no fick to Taverhoff, but form an hospital apart to receive fuch as were infected with these fymptoms accounted dangerous, and that the attendants upon them fhould have no communication whatfoever with other people, till further orders : That what expresses might be fent to Taverhoff, fhould be enjoined not to offer to come near any people on the road, nor in the city Taverhoff, but that they fhould approach the city from that part opposite to the wind; and there, from as great distance as possible, to acquaint the foldier on duty with his orders. A writer at fuch times went, and, in the defart, on the windy fide, took a copy of fuch difpatches, which were immediately burnt. Laftly, a line of foldiers was formed quite round the people in Ikorits, and high gibbets built on these lines, to let strangers and others fee their danger, if they paffed them, for the law would instantly have been put in execution.

From whatever caufe, whether from the immediate protection of heaven, or from thefe regulations having been ftrictly obeyed, I fhall not difpute, but certainly I faw no more more of these terrible fevers: Some indeed appeared in Ikorits, but, confidering the number of people there, and its vicinity to the before-mentioned infected places, it is truly furprising that we escaped fo very well.

From the fituation of Taverhoff, its being furrounded with moraffes, lakes, large woods, and reeds, with what I have faid already about the extraordinary heat and moisture, and the flinking exhalations towards the evenings, from the ftagnant waters in the lakes, it will furprife none, ever fo little verfant in medicine, that the folids of the human body fhould be rendered very weak, by being, through fo many months, as it were flewed. the fecretory and excretory faculties perverted. concretions, obstructions, and viscolities in the fluids nourifhed, and daily increafed. digeflion much impaired : thefe I take to be the true caufes of the endemical difeafes. The method of curing them is, in promoting the evacuations, to perfect regularity, attenuating the vifcous humours, and expelling the morbid; and laftly, in corroborating the folids, and for fome time thereafter affifting them to recover their natural tone, I imaagine is a good proof of the caufe.

But there is another undeniable one; which is, that peafants, having no affiftance from the phyfician, who fall into thefe difeafes, and have the good fortune not to die, generally remain fick during the first fummer; but when

when winter comes on, and their folids are rendered ftrong by the frost, the difease is conquered ; and this natural cure, when it happens, is undoubtedly the most certain. I fhall fay nothing more about the method of curing these different difeases, as quite foreign to this defign, only I can affure phyficians, that necellity cauled us to make trial of monk's rhubarb in place of Chinele; and, if it be given in a double or even a triple dofe, it comes nothing behind the other in fluxes. Another medicine I can scarcely pass by, which is vitrum ceratum antimonii. It has a greater effect upon people almost worn out with either a diarrhoea or dyfentery, providing the greater glands of the abdomen are not ulcerated, than it has upon robuft young men juft feized with this difeafe. I have known people, in the opinion of phylicians of the greateft experience, paft all hopes of recovery, effectually, and in a very fhort time, quite recovered by two or three dofes of this noble medicine, with proper analepticks after its ufe. This digreffion, tho' fhort, may be useful to fome, and can hurt none. anution

Concerning various Anecdotes during my two Years Peregrination in and about Taverhoff.

I Remained in the houfe that I got from Capt. Hertzenbergh till May, very much to my fatisfaction. The Prince had a very numerous family, and, when they got notice that it was determined that the fuperintendency of the building flould be in Taverhoff, the Princefs arrived there, in the beginning of May, with her children. They were not long there till fome of them began to fall fick. The Prince and Princefs were both of them the beff of parents, extremely fond of their children. and had the art of bringing them up without any fevere treatment, in the most agreeable manner. His fons had a governor, and his daughters a governefs. The fons flept altogether in one large room, each in a feparate bed, and their fifters in another, with their governefs, in the fame manner.

They role at flated hours in the morning, paid their devotions, were dreffed, took their meals, went to fchool and their diversions, daily. In fhort, I never knew fuch a large family fo well educated, and under an equal œconomy. They had feven children, four fons and three daughters, at the Princefs's arrival; and and the was delivered of a fifth fon in Taverhoff, who was her laft. This great and antient family is derived from one of the moft illuftrious in Poland. Their first appearance in Ruffia, was in the tyrant Ivan Vafilovitch's time; they were created Dukes of Novogorod Velike, and to this day bear the arms of that province. My Prince and his Princefs commanded refpect from the greatest people, by their eafy fweet deportment. I'm certain they had the best wishes and fervices I could possibly do them, out of pure principle. I never knew a family that in the least could be compared to them.

As I faid before, fome of the Princefs's children fell fick foon after her arrival; and, it feems, the Prince had loft 15 fervants by ficknefs laft year, which frightened them much. They therefore defired that I wouldlive with the adjutant, telling me, that, in that cafe, I should have nothing to provide, either for myfelf, fervant, or horfe. I could deny them nothing, and therefore acquiefced, notwithstanding I forefaw, that fome difference might happen betwixt the adjutant and me; nor was I miftaken ; for, one day, when he and I were both absent, the lock of my defk was picked, and 30 crowns taken away. My fervant was with me; and, as I had driven to Veronits, I needed pocket-money, and took fome out in the morning, when my cafh was fafe. At my return, I put up what I had in my Kk pocket, pocket, and thus made the difcovery. In order to deceive me, he (the adjutant's fervant) had not taken all. He being prefent, I cenfured him for it; he denied, and returned reproachful anfwers, which obliged me to beat him. This certainly was wrong : His mafter took it highly amifs, notwithftanding I acknowledged my error to him. He not only did not forgive this rafhnefs caufed by provocation, but took the rogue's part fo far, as to give me names, which I retorted, and indeed fcarcely could refrain myfelf from striking him. This he wanted much, but I retired. At my return, I learned, that he had complained to the Prince, requiring that a court-martial fhould determine our difpute, alledging, that I had challenged him. The Prince made enquiry ; I told him as above, and faid, that I had not challenged him, but only contended that he durft not give me fuch language at a diftance from witneffes : I faid, I knew he fcarcely had a foul a degree above a fheep's; and therefore it would have been a fign of great folly in me to challenge fuch a milk-fop as he. I defired the Prince to let the court-martial proceed, demonstrating, that, as he was the first aggreffor, and had learned me to use fuch words, the fignification of fome of them I was ignorant of, I certainly fhould be juftified, and recover the money his fervant had ftolen from me.

That

That the Empress had 350,000 good foldiers, each of which fhe could make an officer every jot as good as Balotnicoff ; but that it would prove a little difficult to create one of my profession out of them all. I faid a great deal more; to all which, the Prince defired that I would for this once put it up. I yielded, and immediately Balotnicoff was fent for, and commanded that he fhould never dare to give me the finallest provocation after this, under the penalty of being inftantly fent to Afoph, which was very near as horrible to him as hell itfelf. Thus ended this difpute, nor had I any other in Taverhoff, with this advantage to me, that I got an agreeable apartment in the palace; the Prince made up my lofs, and the Princess ever after, until I was married, was my cafh-keeper.

The above-mentioned difeafe ran like wild fire through this moft noble family; but, to my great fatisfaction, not one of them died. However, in the year 1739, the good Prince was at once affected with a fever and bloody flux. As I never loved man equal to him, my conftant attendance, without fleep for nine days and nights, except in an elbow-chair at his bed-fide for half an hour at a time, had almost deprived me both of my appetite and ftrength. My old friend Dr Miniatty, an acquaintance of the Prince's, came in his way from the Ukraine to Veronits; I therefore begged of him that he would attend the Prince, ill 260 till I fhould get a fleep in my bed; but when I had only laid myfelf down a very fhort time, I was feized with the incubus, a difeafe I never had experienced before. I attempted thrice to get reft, and thrice I was attacked with this dreadful difeafe, which put fleep quite from me. I then put on my cloaths, told what had happened, and let the doctor pafs on to Veronits.

In a few days thereafter, the Prince grew fomewhat better, but recovered very flowly; and, after he was quite free of this flux and fever, he was threatened with a dropfy. There were few parts of his body free of what is called anafarca, but his legs were worfe, attended with fuch coldnefs, that it was almost imposfible to make him fenfible of heat. It took my greateft skill to recover him during the length of the fummer; but at last it was fo fuccefsfully accomplifhed, that I'm told he only died at St Petersburgh laft year, betwixt 80 and 90 years old, full of honour, which he truly deferved : He was then lord high admiral, fenator, privy-counfellor, and knight of the order of St Andrew, the first Rullian order.

Before I leave this fubject, I fhall give one inftance of the Prince's juffice: When he was in fuch an uncertain ftate of health, and as I did every thing in my power for his recovery, I advifed him, among other things, to go to a pleafant village about two miles diftant from Taverhoff, called Shilofke, fitu-

ated on the top of a high dry ground, and a mile at leaft from any woods, except those in the morass betwixt Taverhoff and it, whence the vapours seldom or never ascended so high; and was well watered with a sountain of spring water, as clear as chrystal.

One day as I waited on the Prince, I faw in the entry a very well behaved man, genteelly dreffed. He was the more remarkable, as he had on a fuit of fuperfine cloaths in the English fashion. The next time I waited upon the Prince, this man was fitting at the door upon a heavy clog of wood, to which he was chained by the neck. As the Prince was fo far from hindering me to make inquiry, that he took all opportunities of encouraging me, I hefitated not to alk him the reafon of treating a man fo ignominioufly. He faid, that the late Field-marshal Prince Golitzin had made a prefent of him, when about nine years of age, to my Prince : That, as he efteemed the memory of his brother, he had fpared no expence in making him mafter of writing and arithmetick ; and that, as he was a Crim Tartar by birth, he had him baptifed, and married to a very pretty, modeft, young woman, by whom he had a numerous family. As he had done fo much for him, he appointed him his factor over many villages, and that he had behaved very well till the Prince was fent from Petersburgh, when he imagined himfelf at liberty to act as he pleafed, poffibly expecting pecting that the Empress would take the villages from the Prince: That a petition was fent to him fome time ago, acquainting him, that this fellow had absolutely ruined fome hundreds of people, and that, upon a fair inquiry, he found it was true: That by the laws of the country, he should be hanged, or, at least, fent to the galleys for life; but that he would punish him in this manner. He faid, that he had already appointed another factor, with orders to take every thing from this villain, and make restitution to the peafants as far as was possible.

He alfo had ordered a certain maintenance for his wife and children, with orders to have the children carefully educated; but this fellow fhould undergo a fevere whipping, and then to be fent to the villages, to write under the new factor, to whom orders were given to let no fault go unpunifhed; and laftly, that if it was found out that he had not made a clear difcovery of all the value he had, he would be fent to the galleys for life; whereas, if he had made a clear difcovery, he fhould remain in the village; and, if he behaved well for the future, he had a chance of being again promoted, and freed from his chains.

A N old acquaintance Mr Rofen, a furgeon, defigned for Afoph, arrived in Taverhoff. Mr Burman was unable to perform his duty in the hospital, and fo very weak, that we could have no hopes of his living much longer. Mr Rofen and I had lived in great friendship. He used to interpret for me in the hospital at Petersburgh, as he spoke Latin well, confequently no wonder I was glad to fee him; I therefore, finding it not difagreeable to Mr Rofen, projected a fcheme of getting him kept at Taverhoff. I applied to the Prince, reprefenting the dangerous flate of Mr Burman's health, and the impoffibility of my attending the bufinefs of the hofpital daily, and that of his great command, at the fame time, only with the affiftance of two This had the defired effect, and Mr mates. Rofen was appointed to attend the hofpital, and this was foon confirmed by orders from the medicine-chancery and admiralty. It may appear fcarcely credible, but it is neverthelefs true, that I was greatly at a lofs to fpeak Latin with Mr Rofen at our first meeting, frequently interlarding with it either Ruffian or German words.

words. After I had got an apartment in the palace, where the writers were employed daily, I applied myfelf to learn to read and write the Ruffian language, and it was altogether owing to this, that I was before to confuifed. I knew one Peter Miln, who had been nine years keeping the books for Mr Dimideof, belonging to his great iron-works in Siberia, and who, at his return to St Peterfburgh, could not fpeak Englifh.

Mrs Luggar, a licutenant's widow, arrived in Taverhoff from Aloph, in the latter end of August 1738, in her way to St Petersburgh. Some days paffed before I could fpeak English promptly, and without confounding it with other languages. At Afoph fhe had petitioned Admiral Bredal to pay her widow-money. which that bafe man denied, and the was in fome diffrefs. She was old, but infifted that fhe was marriageable, and capable of bearing children. I suppose the infifted upon this, that fhe might at once get a complete year's falary, viz. the fum of 290 rubles. I begged of her rather to acknowledge that fhe was fuperannuated, that the might get her widowmoney paid yearly, which (as fhe had no thoughts of returning to England) would be a certainty as long as fhe lived, and great abundance in fuch a cheap country as this : but fhe infifted to have the large fum at once. for the before-mentioned reafons, and three years after that, I faw her in St Peterfburgh married married a fecond time. In fhort, I ufed all my intereft with the Prince, and fucceeded in getting her money, and, at her defire, bought her a very convenient houfe, and did every other thing in my power to ferve her; fo glad was I of having one in the place with whom I could fpeak my native language.

This old woman had a daughter married in the neighbourhood to an officer. She alfo arrived in November to fee her mother, and acquainted us, not without fatisfaction, that her hufband, a Ruffian, was dead, by whofe death fhe had acquired a third of his eftate, which was not great. It feems he had ufed her with great feverity, but I fulpect that there were faults on both fides. Mr Rofen made his addreffes to her. As we ever lived in good friendship, he first made his proposals to me, and defired my affiftance, providing I was not engaged with her. I affured him, I was already verbally engaged to another in St Peterfburgh, and, unlefs fhe married in my abfence, I did not think myfelf at liberty to make fuit to any other perfon. I declined giving him any counfel in an affair of fuch confequence ; but, at the fame time, offered my ready fervice to affift him, if he was fully refolved. He faid he was; wherefore I affifted, and the marriage was foon confummated to the fatisfaction of both parties.

In the beginning of the winter 1739, an accident happened at Veronits, which alarmed

the inhabitants of that city and all their neighbours, the mentioning of which, I doubt not. will be agreeable to the reader, becaufe it lets us fee what mifchief may be produced from ignorance, or a miftake in time of the plague. A woman arrived in Veronits from fome diflance, but from a healthy place well attefted. As the had come from a diffance, the defired to use the bagnio, very customary among the Ruffians after much fatigue. After the had washed herfelf, and taken a plentiful fupper, the flept in the hot-houfe. Next morning the was found dead ! The landlord was obliged to acquaint the governor, before he durft bury her. The governor had fent off his only garrifon-furgeon, fome time before this, to affift the inhabitants of Pavelofike ; confequently he had none to direct him in this affair. The field-apothecary lived in Veronits, to be near the army, and prepare medicines for all people in the fervice, in that neighbourhood. He had formerly been afflicted with the plague, and his wife had died of this difeafe the third time fhe was feized with it ; which may be fufficient to undeceive those who imagine that the plague, like the finall pox, afflict perfons only once in their lives.

The governor having no other belonging to the medical affair, ordered the apothecary to vifit the dead body, and report whatever was obfervable, and what was his opinion.

He

He did fo, and reported that fhe had died of the plague, becaufe the had a great buboe in one of her groins. Upon this the governorcaufed that the city, and declare it unclean, denying any intercourfe between the inhabitants and those of other parts : At the fame time, he fent an express to Taverhoff, to acquaint the Prince of the misfortunate condition of the inhabitants of Veronits, requiring the affiftance of a furgeon from thence. In return, the Prince expressed his forrow for their misfortune, but would not allow any of his medical people to go to their affiftance, becaufe he was uncertain how foon we might be in the fame condition, advifing him to fend for proper affiftance to Mofcow, and difcharging him to fend any more to Taverhoff. It happened that fame day in the evening, that two furgeon's mates, in their way from Mofcow to the army, demanded admittance into the city, which the foldier upon duty denied, acquainting them of their miferable condition.

The mates intended to have gone round the city to the next village, for frefh horfes, rejoicing that they could to eafily efcape fuch danger; but an officer was upon duty, and being informed what they were, demanded that they fhould wait at the gate till the governor was made acquainted; telling them, that they probably would be obliged to return, if they went further. The governor was very glad glad to converfe with fuch people, demanded their immediate attendance in his houfe ; and acquainted them with what he knew, had done, and what he dreaded. They faid, that they never had feen that difeafe, but acknowledged that they had read about it, and that they alfo had heard feveral lectures by Dr Blumentrofe, phyfician, by the Great Hofpital in Mofcow, concerning it, and the various methods of cure. In fhort, the governor defired them to take their repole, and next morning caufe the body be taken out of the grave, infpect it very carefully, and make an accurate report of whatever they might difcover. They did fo; found the buboe; but. making a ftricter fearch than the apothecary had done, found out other fymptoms, which determined them to report that the woman had not the finalleft fign of the plague, but that the buboe and fome other fymptoms were venereal, and that the woman had been fuffocated in the bagnio, an event which is not alarming, and which frequently happens in Ruffia, from the carelessness of the people who heat it, and close it up before the coals are thoroughly burnt to charcoal. They also obferved, that the buboe was completely fuppurated, a circumftance which could not have happened, if the had been infected with the plague, efpecially as they had opened the buboe, and declared it was full of well concocted matter.

TRAVELS.

This their report gave universal joy to the city and the adjacent country; but the poor apothecary was much and justly exposed, for his ignorance and prefumption.

A Continuation of the same Subject.

TOUR officers had been appointed by Adi miral Bredal to fuperintend the works at Ikorits, before Prince Golitzin arrived; three of them were Ruffians, and the other a German. It feems the Ruffians had let from the work, under pretence of fickness, &c. the peafants, who were fent from different provinces to affift in getting veffels ready for the use of the army. They had taken money from each peafant, to the value of fome rubles, in order to let them go home. This undoubtedly was a very great crime in Ruffia, where no perquifites whatever are allowed, except their falary, fervants, provision, rations, and forage, according to their ranks. By the articles of war, crimes of this nature are punifhable by death.

The German had, as he told me, taken only two or three men to affift in making a coach for him: Thefe were their crimes. Admiral Bredal, an exceffively proud man, having been made acquainted with thefe affairs, fent

fent for them, and, I was affured, defigned only to chide them : He did fo ; but one named Chiricoff, a lieutenant, a very rich man, and every whit as proud as his commander. could not bear the admiral's taunts : He very unfeafonably retorted with a great deal of virulence : The confequence was, that Chiricoff was arrefted, and a court-martial conveened to judge of this affair. He was found guilty, and, not willing to fuffer alone, he acculed the others, who were also found guilty. Sentence of death was paffed upon them They had remained under arreft, upon all. half pay, three years, and doubted not but they would get a pardon, as Chiricoff was of an honourable family, and had great allian-'ces : But they could not agree among themfelves: and, as they only faw one another at church, they were foolifh enough to fcold there. Captain Ruffelius was importuned by the priefts to reprefent this, which he could not deny. He not only represented it, but alfo begged that the admiralty would either order them to Petersburgh, or free him from any acculation which might be brought against him for not keeping better order, which he affirmed was not in his power. In anfiver to this, the ultimate fentence was fent. confirmed by the Emprefs, commanding that they, without lofs of time, fhould be brought to the parade, and there have their fwords broken over their heads by the hands of the hangman, 15996 hangman, and be declared infamous; that they fhould be fhackled, and fent, under a guard to Oranburgh, to the galleys for life; and laftly, that all their eftates and other riches fhould be forfeited to the Emprefs. This fentence was foon put in execution; but, by the humanity of the captain, not with the greatest rigour, for horfes, carriages, cloaths, and many other things, were let go for the use of their wives and relations. At the fame time, fome writers, who have no rank in the army, were feverely whipt and fent to the galleys, because they knew, and did not difcover, the villainy of the officers.

At this time alfo an affair happened, which put me in a great fright, and was the caufe of laughter to the Prince and others. The archbishop of Veronits was taken ill of a fever, wrote to the Prince, and begged that he would fend me to give the apothecary directions how to cure him. I had been bad for a long time of a tertian ague and bloody flux, which, though fomething better, had reduced my firength very much. The Prince came into my room, told me of the archbishop's ficknefs and defire, but at the fame time faid. that, though fcarcely any thing could give him greater pleafure than to be obliging to the bifhop, yet he would not defire me to go. unlefs I thought I could do it with fafety. Not being able to deny that good man any thing, I confented, and fent to Mr Chiricoff for hangenad for the loan of his large fur-coat, to defend me from the cold. It was at my return from Veronits, that I heard the fentence was to be put in execution next day. I was much afraid when I was told that every thing was to be taken from them, that my having borrowed his furred coat, might have been interpreted much to my difadvantage, efpecially as it was very coffly, the fur alone being fable ; therefore, without lofs of time, I fent it to his house, and then expressed my fears to the fecretary, who laughed at me, as did every one who heard of it, faying, that if I had kept it. tho' all the courts in Peterfburgh had known, it would not have been looked upon as any way criminal, as I had got it before the fentence was publicly declared : However, the fatisfaction I had in the quietness and peace of my mind, was, I think to this day, much preferable to it, if it had been of far greater value.

When the Prince flaid at Shiloffke, I ufed, after I had vifited my patients, frequently to divert myfelf with my fowling-piece upon the banks of the rivers Don and Veronits : One day I came up to a man who wasfifting, and, afking him what fport he had got, and talking with him, I underflood that he was blind, had loft his right leg and thigh, and his left foot ; being a poor young peafant, I gave him fome money, and defired that he would give me an account of the caufe and cure. He faid, that that fome years ago he was taken ill of a violent fever, that these members already named had dropt from him; laftly, that he at the fame time had loft his fight, but that God was his only doctor. He faid the neighbours had kept him clean, and had applied to the ulcerated parts only the leaves of green kail, or bur-dock, made foft before the fire : That, after he had recovered his health, he got a finall boat, and used to go to fish with his neighbours; but that now, he was to well acquainted with the banks of the Veronits, that he frequently went fome miles from the village, and was the principal fifher in it, by which he had got a very good livelihood ; as for riches, he defpised them. I mention this to let people fee that nature, when left to herfelf, fometimes makes incredible cures: and I imagine it may be of use to intelligent honeft furgeons, to be very careful how and when they perform operations; for, in the courfe of my practice, I have known people loft by ignorant daring furgeons.

I fhall give an inftance of nature's having performed a cure, when the patient would have been loft if another method had been taken, and this may be of ufe to all my readers. It was this: A failor was brought to the hofpital. He was very feverifh, an eryfipelas had foread over the fkin of the penis and fcrotum, as far as the os pubis. Every thing was done, which art hitherto recommends, to no purpofe. Mr Rofen and I called for the advice of Mr Frifh at Veronits, a gentleman who had fuccefsfully performed many operations ; the more dangerous, the readier he was to perform ; confequently he gave his advice immediately to amputate all the affected parts. to which I made the following objections : I mo, That the eryfipelas had fpread above the os pubis, and how deep it went, none could poffibly fay. 2do, That his fever was extremely high, and confequently none could juftly fay how far the whole mais of blood was contaminated with the eryfipelatous caufe ; and that daily experience flewed, that in fuch dif. eafes a wound inflicted upon a found part generally translated the eryfipelas to the wounded part, and fometimes left the former difeafed part altogether. This could not be denied, because we frequently found the erysipelas next day affecting ftrongly the member which had been bled. But laftly, a ring, of a brown colour, run quite round, and circumferibed the eryfipelas from the found fkin, which I took to be a fure fign of a feparation ; and confequently, that, if nature's intention was now interrupted, it would undoubtedly caufe the man's death. Mr Frifh was of a different opinion, and was bafe enough, privately. to afperfe my character, by faying, that if the man fhould lofe his life, it was owing to my obstinacy. I foon got notice of this.

And

TRAVELS.

And having been warned, I doubled my diligence, and had the fatisfaction to complete the cure. The fkin of the penis and feretum were quite loft, yet nature furrounded the tefficies and penis with a callofity to admiration; and, though the tefficies were ftrained, yet he was completely cured, and begot children, which I prognofficated to his wife, when fhe ufed to vifit him.

The confequence of this cure was to me very agreeable. Mr Frifh, underftanding that I was for fatisfaction, came to the hofpital when I was there, and, before many of our officers, begged pardon, and acknowledged that he did not think that he was cureable, and believed that the operation was the only cure ; but now was convinced of the contrary. Be that as it may, Mr Frifh certainly fuffered much in his reputation, though not undefervedly.

It was in August when we arrived in the pleafant village Shilofske, and confequently very hot weather ; the foil is dry, rather inclining to fandy. It was towards the evening when we arrived, and I arrived in my travelling-waggon, where I flept the first night, or rather defigned to take my reft, for my eyes were not flut one hour the whole night, occasioned by an innumerable quantity of fleas, which forced me at last, with others, to get up and walk about, among whom was the Prince's eldest fon Prince Alexander, the the fame who was lately ambaffador at the Court of London. We were affured that the defart, every fummer, was in the fame condition; but that where many people lodged together, or encamped, their numbers very foon decreafed, and we found this to prove true at Shilofske.

We again returned to Taverhoff in the latter end of September, the good Prince having recovered, to the unfeigned joy of his own family, and all the good people who had the happines to be aquainted with him. He reaffumed his command, which was like to have run into confusion, when he was fick.

A gentleman of the name of Ifmaeloff, of an antient family and great poffellions, was fent to Taverhoff, it was faid, by the defire of his relations. He was but weak and vain. a great lover of game, and confequently every villain could make a bait for him : He was good natured, and therefore not dangerous. He was a relation to the Prince, and his Lady a near relation to the Princefs royal Elifabeth, afterwards Empress of Ruffia. This gentleman kept a large pack of hounds, many grey-hounds, and other kinds of dogs. He was only a lieutenant, but the Prince appointed under him proper mid-fhip-men, who transacted the affairs of the Empire without blemifh. Mr Ifmaeloff rejoiced in nothing fo much as obliging every one as far as he could. He hunted frequently, and, not only.

TRAVELS.

only made every one welcome to partake of that diversion, but regaled them fumptuoufly, and looked upon them as his friends. When the weather would not permit of hunting, we might ever meet with fome agreeable diversion in Mr Ismaeloff's house, providing only that it happened to be none of his drinking days, which were very frequent. Every pleafant fummer-day, we either went a-hunting, fifting, fowling, or playing, and drinking our tea at the fide of a wood, or on the banks of a river, in the afternoons only; and in this manner I paffed two years, as it were in paradife, except only when I was fick. The good Prince never failed to honour us with his prefence, when affairs permitted, and when he could not, the Princefs and a coachful or two of his children were partners. of our innocent diversions.

There are many wolves and bears about Taverhoff, and the inhabitants have different ways of catching them; as a relation of this kind may be agreeable to fome of my readers, take what follows. The bear is killed with a piece of fharp fteel fixed on the end of a fhort ftrong pole, and a club armed with a heavy piece of iron: When they have roufed the bear, he makes a brifk attack, inflantly the peafant gets on his knee, and fixes his pole on the ground, keeping the fharp fteel pointed to the bear, who, not obferving, or elfe little afraid of the pole, rufhes on to the man, who directs 278 VOYAGES AND directs the fteel fo, as to pierce his breaft, and then with one blow of his armed club on the head, difpatches him at once. I have been told that they are fo fond of bear-hunting, that, though it is attended with great danger, they very carefully will go to kill them, without acquainting any of their neighbours. Another way is with ftrong nets in the woods, and the mulquet. A third way is more curious, and not dangerous : They take a large door, into which they drive many pieces of iron made very fharp, and flanding fome inches above the wood, into the middle of this they fix a living pig, which fqueaks the whole night, then they cover all over with grafs or reeds. When the bear hears the pig, he makes all the hafte he can to feize his prey; but when he jumps on the door, the fharp irons, being bearded, run into his feet, then he turns himfelf on his back, and continues to roll and roar with the door above him, till the hunter next morning difpatches him. There are many fierce wolves about Taverhoff in the winter feafon, which they kill, by tying a living pig to the end of a fledge with a long rope ; two men fit in the fledge well armed with guns loaded with flug-fhot. They drive their horfe by fome wood, and then throw out the pig which makes a loud noife, at which the wolves come out, and, endeavouring to feize their prey, are difpatched with the fowlingpleces, but the flot renders the fur of fmall value value. Two accidents happened when I was in Tayerhoff, which deferve to be mentioned.

An old failor used to get a dead horse, or a piece of one, and carry it to the defart, into the middle of which he fixed a flick : he then planted two or three loaded guns, pointed to the flick, in fuch a manner, that if any thing moved the horfe, the motion, by the help of fmall cords, drew the triggers. One morning, as the failor went to fee what kind of game he had got, he fpied from a diftance fomething very bulky, and, though it was froft, when the boars don't roam abroad, yet he imagined it could be nothing elfe. Gladly he run to the part, but foon was undeceived. It was a man who had loft his way, having been the worfe of drink, and feeing fomething black among the fnow, went and fat down to take a reft, where he was wounded by nine flugs. The poor man was cured, but the failor, after a long confinement, was difcharged fuch diversion ever after. Two foldiers belonging to the garrifon of Veronits, lovers of fport, went one night, according to cuftom, to fome hay-ricks with a pig; an old large cunning wolf appeared, but did not run fraight to the pig ; after running about them fome time, he jumped upon the head of one of the foldiers, and very foon would have devoured him, had not the other, who was very near him, fhot him dead, which he did without wounding the man.

If

If a man has only a few houfes of his own; though he may be ever fo rich, he, (not as here) dare not affume the title of gentleman; he is only a peafant of the better fort, and called odna dvorctz, which fignifies in Englifh, one houfe. One of these peafants lived in the neighbourhood of Taverhoff, he was extremely obliging : One winter-day, he begged of the Prince to permit his children to go and fee his method of fifhing, which was granted, and I made one of the party. After we had got a homely repart in his houfe, we went to a pleafant lake about three miles long, but not half a mile broad, where we frequently used to divert ourfelves in the fummer feafon, by fifting, fhooting, gathering ftrawberries and different kinds of fruit growing on the banks, and this odna dvorctz fupplied us with cream in abundance. Thither we went with a light, and well armed, for fear of wolves; the peafant cut a circular hole through the ice, and, caufing the light to be held near it, with a net in the form of a large laddle, he took as many fifh as he pleafed, fuch as perches, pike, tench, and carp. In fhort, he loaded two fledges in lefs than an hour. This relation may furprife fome at first reading, but the fact is fo well known. that, in Ruffia, the peafants have no readier way of catching filh for their ufe; and they fay, which is most reasonable, that the fifh included publication defwim

After this manner we lived in Taverhoff. till the middle of October, when orders arrived to the Prince, acquainting him of the peace, and commanding him to caufe lay up all ftores, and veffels already built, or near finifhed, under fhades, to appoint proper officers to take notice of every thing left; finally to difmifs his command, make his repair to St Petersburgh, and take a feat in the fenate. and admiralty. This was agreeable news to us all. I looked upon Peterfburgh, as I would have done upon London ; and now all people were employed to get every thing ended : But the Prince never would leave any thing half done, which caufed us to remain in Taverhoff till February 1740, when we were thinking to fet out in two or three days for St Peterfburgh. One morning I went into the Princefs's chamber, and was not a little furprifed to fee her weeping, and in fo much forrow that the could not fpeak one word. I had not been there three minutes, till the Prince entered, dreffed only in his morning gown ; and, pointing to the Princefs, finiled, tho' he was alfo grieved, and faid, obferve Fatiana, for that was the Princefs's name, how fhe grieves for what can not be helped, fince it is agreeable to GoD and the government.

He faid, that about midnight a courier arrived, with orders for him to make his repair to Aftrachan, and govern that kingdom till further orders ; he then threw his gown about me, and faid, it grieved him most that he was obliged to fend me to St Peterfburgh, and efpecially at this time, when three of his children were fick, and the Princefs not well recovered from the effects of a petechial fever. fhe had near loft her life by. To which I anfwered, that, if I should not be reckoned a deferter, I would go with him and his family to any part upon earth ; but that I would defire to be fent from Aftrachan to St Petersburgh when he arrived, by which means neither the admiralty nor medicine chancery could blame me ; becaufe, as we were to proceed very faft, I could return by poft, as foon as I was obliged by the eamfhicks, or ordinary way of marching, which is at the rate of 50 verfts in three days, agreeable to Peter the Great's regulations.

My ready answer gave them both great fatisfaction. Econtra his adjutant, whom he had, from a maker of barrels, made an officer, denied to go further than Pavelofske ; but the Prince eafed him of that trouble, and not only excused him, but granted liberty and time enough to go and spend fome days with his relations, before he should arrive in St Petersburgh.

We loft no time in getting every thing ready, and left Taverhoff on the 10th of February 1748, and next morning reached to Novopavelofske, wopavelofske, where there are fome thoufands of men conftantly employed in making and repairing finall arms for the army. An accident happened here, which I fhall very briefly relate.

The commandant, who was only a major, came to pay his refpects to the Prince, and demanded his orders. I was walking in the lobby till breakfast was ready; my furred coat, and the reft of my drefs, were the fame as that of the Prince's fons ; for every year I got from the Princel's two complete fuits of cloaths, one for the winter and the other for fummer. He came up to me, and alked, if the Prince was to be feen? I faid he was, and fhewed him the door : He then in a most fub miffive manner afked me, What my rank in the army was ?' I told him : He then in a most despiteful manner faid, Is that all ! and moved off. As there were none prefent, I hefitated not to acquaint him, that he certainly was a mushroom fprung from froth. He went into the room however, without returning any anfwer; from this I was certain, that he either was no gentleman, or if he was, he had had none of the genteel education which the Ruffians beflow upon their children with fuch care. I was not mistaken. A fervant warned me to go to breakfaft ; when I entertered the room, the Prince was fitting taking a difh of coffee, at fome diftance from the table ; My commandant was fanding at the door door, a fure fign that he was no gentleman : The Princefs and her children were fitting at the table. When I had fhut the door, I made a very low bow to my major, and begged to know his rank; at which the noble family all ftared, well knowing it was not my cuftom to be impertinently inquifitive to ftrangers. The major, not a little difconcerted, anfwered pitifully enough, that he was a major and commandant of the city; to which I eplied, Is that all ! it is undoubtedly for want of a better, turned round with an air of importance, and took my place at the table. The whole family were greatly embarraffed to keep from laughter ; but they were foon freed of all reftraint, for I only began to tell what paffed in the lobby, when my major made a low bow, and fuddenly departed ; but before he left the house, he must have heard a very hearty laugh, and, no doubt, he knew it was at his expence. I never could put up with vain, empty, felf-fufficient fools, but continually took all opportunities to humble them.

The Prince faid, that he was a gentleman, but that their family was fearcely known, and therefore remained in a ftate of old ignorance; and that he believed this major was the greateft military rank belonging to his family. Thus we travelled on, night and day brifkly, through the fame villages I mentioned in my journey to Kotchatoff, till we arrived upon the line which reacheth from the Don to the river river Volga. Before I defcribe this line, I must mention two little accidents, which happened to me betwixt Pavelofske and the line.

The first was, the Princess fometimes defired that I should fit upon the forepart of the fledge in which fhe and the Prince were, in order to pass the time. When we had left Pavelofske, I went into a very large fledge to vifit two of the fick children; it was very warm ; and, whilft I was talking with them and the nurfes, the fledge went off; they advifed me to fit still, to which I had no objection; accordingly we proceeded to the next village, without the finalleft accident : But, when I came to the Prince and Princefs, they feemed to be furprifed, telling me, that they thought I had been loft, as none knew where I was. The Prince had on the way difpatched back an express to Novopavelofske, to fee what was become of me ; but they faid it was a good fcheme to go into the fick-fledge.

One fine frofty day we arrived in a village fituated high on the banks of the Don. As we were to ftay a few hours here, the fervants and other idle people poured water on the fide of the hill, which inftantly froze like glafs; they then, men and women, upon the bark of trees, flided down the hill. This is a diverfion which the Ruffians are very fond of ; the Princefs went out to fee it, and I accompanied her. After we had looked on a while, the defired that I would try it alone, for fome times times three, or even four, can either fit or fland on the bark, but then they are often overfet, and this occasions laughter, especially among the women, when what they commonly take great pains to hide, is exposed to public view.

They were fo fond of the diversion, that, the winter I was employed in the hofpitals in St Peterfburgh, I was informed the Empress Ann caufed make a hill of fnow for it ; and that Prince Courakin, the fame who was fome time envoy at the Court of Great Britain, who at that time was mafter of borfe, and nfed to take great liberties in order to divert the Empress : He frequently fat upon a small fledge, and took fome of the ladies upon his knee ; but when the velocity of the fledge, at the foot of the hill, was fo diminifhed as not to endanger hurting the ladies, he then fell off with his fair partner, to the mirth of the byftanders ; but the ladies were dreffed in long linen drawers, fo that their modefty was not hurt. At the Princefs's defire, I fat down on the middle of a large piece of bark ; and, as I was not acquainted with fuch exercifes, I through ignorance placed my legs alfo upon the bark : Thus equipped, I was gently pufhed off, and, though I did not fall off, the bark turned fo frequently round, that it exhibited to the skilful spectators much mirth. At last, my bark being very fmooth, and I unfkilful. not able to direct it, carried me forward into a pit, a pit, from whence the people used to fetch water. This unforefeen accident foon turned their mirth into the other extreme. I however went down unhurt, and it being all frozen over, except a finall hole, I was in no danger ; therefore, confidering how merry they had been at my expence, in my turn I had the fatisfaction to divert myfelf at their fright; I lay ftill, not visible by them, and obferved many, in their hurry, to help me, lying on the fide of the hill, overturned in fo many different fhapes, that, at another time, it would have exhibited a fcene of laughter to all fpectators. At laft, when they came near me, I arofe, and left my vehicle for them to carry back at my return. The Princefs faid, fhe never would again defire me to make proof of my readinefs to oblige her at fuch a rifk, which indeed fhe was ignorant of.

We at laft arrived on the weft end of this much famed line, which runs betwixt the rivers Don and Volga, a work of the great Peter's, fit only for fuch a Prince to have made. It is a ditch and rampart reaching the whole length of 60 verfts; the ditch is 20 yards broad, well formed, and proportionably deep. The rampart is very high, and the fouth fide, towards the Kalmucks (commonly called Calmuks in other authors) country, or the defart of Aftrachan, is planted with high and ftrong pallifadoes made of fir-trees, drove into the ground, and faftened together with crofsbeams, beams, fo clofe, that a man cannot get thro' any where, except, I think, at two places, through which brooks of water run, and thefe are fortified as far as art hath hitherto been able. There are four ftrong forts built upon this line at equal diffances, well flored with cannon, and betwixt the forts are many houfes, where foldiers only live. Centinel-boxes are placed on the top of the wall, the whole length, fo near one another, that the foldiers on duty can almost fpeak together. The names of the forts from the west end to the east, are called in the fame order, viz. Donskaja, Ofokor, Graczi, Meczotnaja, and Tfaritzin, in other authors falfely called Carizyn.

The defign of building this line, is to reftrain the incurfions of the Kalmucks into the Empire of Ruffia, and, although it has the effect of curbing great bodies, yet finall parties have made their way thro' where the brooks run, and done very confiderable damage, as will be taken notice of in courfe of my travels. We reached that caffle called Ofokor. about feven at night, and as the horfes were very tired, and no change to be got here, we were obliged to take our lodging in the caftle. Except the captain's apartment, who was commandant of the caftle, there was no other private clean room in it; this being defined for the Prince and his family, I could get none, unlefs I would fleep in the guard-room, which was very large, but as full of men as it could ftow.

flow, and I imagine this was the coldeft night I had ever experienced in my life. I flaid in the Prince's apartment till bed-time, and as it was exceffively cold after fupper, I took a little more wine than I used to do, to comfort me, but notwithstanding all my care, when I went to the door, it was intolerable. I then returned into the guard-room; but though it was warm enough, when I viewed the number of people of all forts, I by no means thought of making one of their company : I therefore ordered my fervant to get ready two bottles of boiling water to be put to my feet, and a wax candle to be lighted in my fledge, and when all was ready to let me know. He did fo, and I went as quickly as I was able, had my boots taken off, laid myfelf down under good fur covers, having a good furred gown wrapped clofs with a fall on my body, and a warm furred cap on my head, yet I really imagined that I would have been frozen to death this night; for after my fervant had buckled the cover of the fledge faft, and retired, had I fo defigned, I would not have been able to get out again without help. In this condition, I put out the candle, and ftill with my feet at the bottles of water which comforted me not a little, I fell afleep, and flept found, till eight next morning, when I was roufed from fleep by being overturned amongst the fnow, as my driver was paffing down a fteep 00 hill :

hill: Nor did I hear the cannon which were difcharged at their governor's departure. I was in a great fweat; but the men were not long before they had replaced all my affairs, and put me to bed; where I remained in pretty good conditiontill Iarrived in Tfaritzin.

The city Tfaritzin' is neat and very compact, the ftreets well laid out, but the houfes are all of timber; it is furrounded with a deep dry ditch and high ramparts with bafflions, well flored with great cannon. At Mr Cultzoff's the commandant, an old colonel, very ferious defire, the Prince remained here till next morning, when we fet out, and the day thereafter, arriving at Tchornajar, or black-hill, we travelled now on the Volga. Tchornajar is diftant from Tfaritzin 112 verfts, and from Aftrachan 300. It is but a fmall town, fortified in the fame manner as Tfaritzin, but they have not fo many cannon. The Prince, having been informed that the ice below this town was not good, refolved to go hence in the morning, that he might pass this dangerous place in day-light. The city flands on a high ground, that they . may fee far into the defart, least the Kalmucks, who inhabit this country, make fome fudden attack upon them. I fhall defcribe these people afterwards. Next morning, we departed, efcorted by 300 Coffacks and a party of dragoons; the way from the town to the river is very fleep, and it was my lot. at

at this time, to have a pair of very good young horfes in my fledge, I was also in the rear : Whether the fledge had bore hard upon the horfes, or the report of the cannon had frighted them, I know not, but they ran off, and my driver fell from his box, and left the horfes at their own will; my fervant alfo flipt off from behind. The horfes galloped on, and had almost overturned the fledge in which the Prince was. He, according to his former goodnels, immediately gave orders to the dragoons and Coffacks to endeavour to get betwixt my fledge and a piece of the Volga on the west fide, not frozen, about a mile or two long. My fledge was unbuckled on the right fide, looking to that unfrozen part of the Volga. I faw it, but knew not what to do, I attempted to get hold of a piftol, in order to fhoot one of the horfes, but they ran very fwiftly; the ice was by no means fmooth, many boards lying one upon another, being frozen together, made me imagine that, as I hoped, I should be overturned, and confequently prevented my getting a piftol; at laft, I fpyed the horfemen get betwixt me and the water, who, with their whips and cries forced the horfes to run towards the east shore. which gave me hopes that I flould at leaft escape drowning : At laft, a gallant Coffack, upon a fwift horfe, got hold of one of the reins of the horfe in the fhafts, and, by a fudden jerk, threw down that horfe; any may eafily imagine, that I made what hafte I could to get out of the fledge, but was furprifed, when out, that with great difficulty I could either stand or walk, a tremor. which had feized me, was fo violent : But whether this proceeded from fear, to which I never was remarkably fubject, or the irregular diverfity of motions, I fhall not fay; but the tremor continued more than twenty four hours, and fuch a tremor I never experienced either before or fince, though I at fundry times, have been in as great danger, as will be feen in the fequel. Nothing further remarkable happened in this journey, till we arrived all fafe in Aftrachan, which we did on the fifth of March.

CHAP. LIII.

A description of the City and Kingdom of Astrachan, &c.

THE city of Aftrachan is built upon an ifland called the ifland of Hares, that ifland lying eaft and weft, having the famous river Volga on its north fide, it makes a pretty appearance to ftrangers at their arrival from Ruffia; becaufe they have a view of its length, and the steeples of all its churches with a very high brick wall, which furrounds both it and its citadel: Mr Hanway has been been mifinformed. He fays, it contains about 70,000 inhabitants. It certainly contains many more than an hundred thousand, but this in Ruffia, is not to be certainly known, as they keep no register of women and very young children. The city is in latitude 46 degrees 13 minutes, and 68 degrees eaft longitude. The citadel is built upon the weft end of the city on a hill, the wall furrounding it is of brick, 30 feet high at leaft, and very thick, having many high ftrong baftions, mounted with a great number of large cannon : But it is not a regular fortification, though ftrong enough for any enemy in that country: Aftrachan lieth 60 versts from the Cafpian sea: In it are contained magazines of all kinds, the governor's and archbishop's palaces, the government's chancery where all affairs, civil and military, are judged of, and all the records are kept. The metropolitan church, a large monaftery, all built with white freeftone, guard-houfe, and feveral other buildings, are within the walls of the citadel: There are only three gates into the citadel, one from the city, another from the fouth opening into the Tartar fuburbs, a third from the north towards the Volga. The wall of the city takes its beginning from the north eaft corner of the citadel, and runs eaftward three quarters of a mile, then turns fouth a quarter of a mile, and proceeds from the fouth east corner weft, till it again joins the fouth-east corner of the citadel. There are only three gates looking towards the river, one only to the eaft, and two to the fouth. Like the citadel, it has many baftions mounted with cannon, but not built in a regular way.

On the infide of the walls, betwixt them and the houfes, there is a void fpace, where none are allowed to build 20 fathoms broad. quite round the city. There are three long ftreets from east to weft, and many crofs-Areets interfecting the former three. There are within the walls two large ftone churches, and one of wood. I think the length of the city and citadel is equal to an English mile. The houses are built with timber, and the ftreets are laid over with timber allo, fo that a fire happening in this city must be very dangerous. The fuburbs are many, and extend wide : They contain many more inhabitants than the city. There are two churches on the east, and a large monastery of stone, one wooden church on the fouth, and one betwixt the river and city on the north, all for those of the Greek perfuasion; befides which, the reformed have one built with timber, the Romans have a monastery, and the Armenians have a fine church, thefe two are built of ftone.

The hofpitals are built without the fuburbs on the eaft, befide the large monaftery, both for the army and fleet, though the admiralty ilit is built on the well end of the citadel, inclofed with a deep ditch and rampart, with baffions mounted with cannon. The Ruffian and Armenian merchants inhabit the eaftern fuburbs, the Ruffians only the fouth and north, but the ancient Tartar inhabitants live in the fuburbs next to the admiralty. Within the city none of the Tartars are permitted to live, and they are forced to evacuate the city every evening before fun-fet; if they are found in it after that time, they are fent to a guardhoufe, there being one at every gate, and next morning are feverely whipped on the bare back.

The Indians, and fome Armenians, are permitted to live in two fpacious caravanferas, which have only two ports, at which guards are kept day and night; they are inclofed with high frome walls.

The kingdom of Aftrachan on the fouth is confined by Circaffia, and 44 degrees 10 minutes north latitude, on the weft by 62 degrees 30 minutes east longitude, on the north by 52 degrees north latitude, and on the east by 69 degrees east longitude, as they compute; for the inhabitants have no certain knowledge of the extent of this great kingdom to the cast, possibly it may reach to the Jaik river, or further.

Being an Account of the Jaik river inhabitants; and a relation of what passed there, with some Anecdotes which the Author was informed of from creditable People, &c.

BEFORE I treat of what properly concerns Aftrachan, I thought it would be agreeable to the reader, to be informed of the nations which live on the confines of that kingdom. The Coffacks inhabit the Don on the eaft. Circaffia is on the fouth, an account of which I fhall give in the courfe of my travels, when I arrive in that country. The kingdom of Cazan, and part of Siberia, bound Aftrachan on the north, but to the eaft, as I faid before, the inhabitants are ignorant of their proper limits, it being all defart, except the forts of Ilek, Borodiníkoi, and Orenburgh, which properly belong to the province of Ufimíkaja.

The river Jaik takes its rife in very different parts, both fouth and north. I fhall deferibe its courfe from the north. Streams run from the mountains and lakes in Ufimfkaja in the north latitude of 54 degrees 20 minutes, and 79 degrees eaft longitude ; it continues its courfe fouth-eaft through a vaft defart, and difembogues itfelf into the Cafpian fea, fouthfouth-fouth-east from the city of Astrachan, distant about 140 verfts. At the diftance of 2 or 300 verfts north from the mouth of this river. there is a large firong town, which a colony of Don's Coffacks built, and at prefent inhabit ; they called it Jaik after the river. It feems that they hitherto have bravely defended themfelves against all the different Tartar tribes which furround them. BetwixtAftrachan city and Tfaritzin and the river Jaik, till you arrive at the town Jaik, there is not one fixed inhabited place. This vaft defart, neverthelefs, is inhabited by different hoards of wild Tartars, which annoy their civilized neighbours very much. They who roam next the Cafpian are called Karakalpaaks, and they who roam to the north of the Karakalpaaks are called Kirgees and Bafkeers, they are faid to profefs the Mahomedan religion : Many broils yearly happen betwixt them and the Kalmucks, nor is it in the power of Ruffia to prevent this, although, as fhall be hereafter explained, they are at no finall charges and trouble to keep peace amongft them.

The Kirgees and Baskeers, in the latter end of the year 1739, being Mahomedans, and understanding that the Russians carried on a bloody war against their brethren the Turks. without the fmalleft provocation, fell fuddenly upon the open and defencelefs villages in the fouth of Umfimafoskaja province, murdered all the very old people who unluckily fell fell in their way, together with the infants, and carried with them all the young people of both fexes, propoling, either to keep them for flaves, or elfe fell them to others.

They could not have perpetrated fuch vilhiny in a worfe time for themfelves. Vafilic Nikititch Tarifhoff was governor in Orenburg, a man, though I cannot commend his morals. as fit to treat with fuch barbarians as any one in Rulfia, of whom I shall have occasion to fay more afterwards. This governor, who had his fines every where, foon, not only got notice of the horrid depredations the Kirgees had committed, but certain advice where they were ; and that they were living at all cafe, word of care, and quite indifferent about what they had been doing. He prefently difpatched 5000 regular troops, and 3000 Coffacks, under able commanders, with proper inftructions. They marched with all fecrecy, and. although the Kirgees were faid to be upwards of 20.000 fighting men ftrong, the Ruffians fell on them in a morning, and made a terrible flaughter ; few got away. The Ruffians, who were with them, obtained their liberty, and the Kirgee and Bafkeer women and children were, in their turn, made prifoners ; for the Ruflians killed none, but fuch as were able to carry arms.

This relation I had from a furgeon of dragoons, who was in the action, and had fourmale and female children for his fhare; he faid, that he might have got i oo, if he could have maintained them. He told me, that they were much pinched for want of provisions for fuch a number of people in the defart : That the foldiers have been known to fell either a boy or a girl for a pinch of fnuff ; and Mr Tatilhoff, afterwards governor of Aftrachan, confirmed this relation, which Mr Chenmitzer, for that was the furgeon's name, had told me. Since that terrible maffacre, they never more were heard of, fo long as I ftaid in Ruffia.

I faid, that the Coffacks had first found out that fine river Jaik, and built a town to which they gave the name of the river. They fortified it strongly, fo as to become respected by the strongest hoards of Tartars, and, of course, they were a good barrier to the Rufsian dominions. They acquired great riches by fishing and hunting, but fishing was their principal staple, which, when they had cured, they carried by water to Astrachan, and fold them there to be fent to Russia.

Before Peter the Great's time, though the Volga abounded with the best fifth in the world, fifthing was of no benefit to the crown. A poor pealant, named Demidioff, whom I was intimately acquainted with, when he was very rich: He could neither read nor write, yet he began that ufeful branch of commerce: He improved it fo much, that when Peter was in Aftrachan the first time, he fent for him, who told the Emperor all his fchemes, and made it evident to his penetrating genius, that, if he had a finall fum of money, he was in condition to make this one of the beft branches of trade in Aftrachan. The Great Peter ordered him 20,000 rubles, and gave him all encouragement, prohibiting any to moleft him in any fhape. In a few years thereafter, Demidioff paid off the Emperor's money, and had many veffels of burden on the Volga. When I was there, he had fhips of 200 tons trading to Perfia, and was efteemed one of the richeft merchants in Aftrachan.

The fifting became fo refpectable, that taxations were laid upon it, before I arrived there. and a cantoir was crected to take care that they were duly collected ; over and above this, the crown feized upon the ichthyocolla, and all kind of glew. Many years after this, the court got notice, that, in a fhort time, the Jaik fifhery would even vie with that of Aftrachan. and refolved to eflablish a cantoir in Jaik, in the fame manner as they had done in Aftrachan: In confequence of this, proper officers and writers were difpatched to Jaik. (This happened about the time of my arrival.) When they arrived, they fent for the Coffacks, and declared to them the Imperial decree, probably in a haughty threatening manner. The Coffacks flared at this, and urged that they had first found out this river; that they paid as much as any of the Don Coffacks, from whom they were fprung ; that they were always true and faithful to the Empire; that they had, by great labour and expence, built this town. and had defended themfelves against all their neighbouring Tartar enemies, without the affiftance of Ruffia, at a very great expence of their blood ; and laftly, that, if it were not for fear of them, even Orenburgh would be in no fmall danger from the great Tartar Prince Jean-beck-bater, who was able to affemble an army of 100,000 fighting men cafily, and who had often put Orenburgh in no fmall fright, notwithstanding their formidable garrifon, &c. Thefe were their principal reafons ; but, to fuch high lords, they fignified nothing, and they infifted, not only to levy the taxes proposed, but also forthwith to have a refpectable garrifon established there.

This was a bitter pill, and fo very naufeous, that that very night they fummoned a council of the Coffacks, and determined not to fwallow it. Next morning, they waited upon thefe new-comers, and fent them headlong into the other world, by drowning them in the river. Several expresses were dispatched after that from Petersburgh, to know what could be the reason they never had received any report from Jaik. The Coffacks fent them all the fame way. At last, Mr Tatifhoff was employed to find out what was become of the commissioners: He indeed got notice that they were all drowned; but, at the the fame time, advifed the court to take no further notice of it, till the country was better peopled, and a few forts built about them. And thus this affair ended to the fatisfaction of the Coffacks. Certainly a government knows very little of found policy, if they think it a good fcheme to opprefs borderers.

Men, who think they are unreafonably oppreffed, will not fail, upon all occafions, to take the first opportunity they meet with, to fliake themfelves free of their oppreffors, even at the risk of life and liberty. How much blood the Romans, English, and Scots, have lost, only to maintain their liberty, every perfon knows, or may be informed of by history : And we have frequently feen, from very finall beginnings, that many governments have been quite overturned, and much blood and treasure lost, by the ill-founded schemes of a weak, or wicked administration.

What happened at our first coming to Astrachan.

HAVING in fome measure cleared the way, and made the reader acquainted with the neighbourhood of Astrachan, I propose to let him know what is worthy of notice at the Prince's arrival. He was within three or four miles of the city, when many officers, officers, and the principal inhabitants of the city, to the number of fome hundreds, approached him, and, on the ice, which was very bad, paid their compliments to him, which he, in the most obliging manner, peculiar to himfelf, returned as he passed on.

They then returned behind the governor's fuite, and fo drove on to the city. When he entered under the principal port, the cannon began there, and were fired off quite round the city and citadel. When he entered the citadel, he was there received by the guards under arms, who paid their compliments with their arms, drums, and mufic. He next arrived at the governor's palace, and there was faluted by his own proper guard, confifting of a captain's command, viz. 120 men under arms, and a complete band of mufic.

I gave directions to my fervant to get fome room to put up my bed in for that night, till I fhould have more leifure to feek out a convenient lodging, and then went to fee my fick provided for. I had not been long about that, when the Princefs defired me to go into the great hall, where the Prince was. I did fo : He was ftanding fpeaking with the principal officers, civil and military. There was one tall well-made old man, that bore a very diffinguifhed deportment, but he feemed very penfive. I inquired who he was? and was anfwered by the captain on duty, that his name was Younger ; that he was a brigadier dier, and commandant of the city ; that it was thought he had almost loss his judgment by a fright, which he would acquaint me of when more at leifure ; and lastly, that his father was a Scots gentleman.

A great number of merchants entered the hall, every one having fome coftly prefent for the Prince ; fome with different wines, fruits. and fweet-meats of all kinds ; others with rich filks, fattins, brocades, the produce of India and Perfia ; others with cloths, &c. When the Prince obferved them, he, in his homely way, returned them thanks, and faid, Gentlemen, I doubt not but you are accuftomed to make prefents to your new governors, but I am fo fimple, that I never could take a prefent in my life, and therefore beg you'll let them be carried home : I am determined to distribute justice, as far as my judgment shall direct me, to great and finall alike. The honeft man is always my bofom-friend, whatever his condition otherways may be. And I am to inform you, that, after this admonition, if any shall bring prefents to the Princes or any of my family, (you may believe me to be fincere) I will look upon that perfon as my enemy, and thall thun him accordingly.

Then he turned to the gentlemen of the army, and faid, Gentlemen, you and I are quite ftrangers; I hope you fhall experience, that I am an honeft man, and confequently love honeft men, and fuch as delight in doing their duty duty to her Majefty. Such I shall always efteem and honour, whether their rank is great or fmall. I have no doubt of every one's observing his duty, in his different station. I have only faid this, that I may at once be known to you. All the gentlemen returned him thanks because he spoke his mind to freely. The merchants fent off their prefents to their own homes ; but one might eafily have feen furprize in their countenances, and, (by this time I underftood the Ruffian language very well,) I overheard them making their different remarks, though all agreed that they never had feen a governor, at his first arrival, before this, refuse a present; becaufe, fay they, fuch prefents are not given by way of bribes, nor can fuch prefents bear any other interpretation, than that of a certain regard which they wanted to express for the perfon of their governor.

He happened to caft his eye upon me, and defired to fpeak with me. He asked, If I was fatigued with my journey ? and feveral other questions he put to me, as if he had been my father. I told him, that I only wanted a lodging. He faid, in the most affectionate manner, that where-ever he lodged, I fhould have my fhare. Then he turned to the gentlemen, and faid fo much about me that I shall not repeat it, and withdrew to the Princefs, and told her what had paffed. She was very well pleafed at every thing, but his fo Qq fo very peremptorily refufing the prefents, efpecially as it never was forbidden, even by Peter the Great, who did not refufe to take a prefent, purely from the refpect people had for him.

After a fhort ftay, the gentlemen retired, and left the governor and his family to put their affairs to rights, and take their repofe, which indeed we needed, fince we left Tfchornaya, becaufe we had no houfes betwixt that city and Aftrachan to lodge in, except zemlenkes, which, as has already been defcribed, are built under-ground, and therefore not agreeable to every one ; add to this, that we were obliged to keep ftrict watch, left the Kalmucks made an affault upon us unprovided.

serpiretation, than that of

Concerning the Inhabitants and other Pcople living in, and immediately about Aftrachan.

R USSIANS, in our days, are the natural, and the greateft number of the inhabitants of the city of Aftrachan, but the kingdom is inhabited by Kalmucks and Nagai Tartars; the laft of which are the defcendents of the antient inhabitants, who were conquered by Ivan Vafilitch the tyrant. They,

at this day, pay very great respect to their chiefs, who are called by them Murzas.

The city is inhabited by great numbers of Georgians, who embrace the Greek religion, and ferve in the army, as alfo Armenians. They do not feek much after any other glory than merchandife, and are reckoned as cunning as the Jews, though they all profefs the Chriftian religion. I have often thought, and am ftill of opinion, that they, viz. the Armenians and Georgians, are the defcendents of the Jews who were fent into captivity by Nebuchadrezzar. They are liker the Jews than any other people I ever faw, and, though they are Chriftians, yet they have all the cunning and deceit of their progenitors.

There are many Perfians, and various kinds of Tartars, which I do not rank among the inhabitants, becaufe they plead dependence upon their own proper countries.

The Kalmucks properly inhabit that great defart lying betwixt the rivers Volga and Don, having Circaffia on the fouth, and the line, already deferibed, running betwixt the Volga and the Don on the north. They till no land, but feed their numerous flocks. They have no fixed place of abode, but emigrate from one place to another continually, living in tents made in the form of bee-hives; the better kinds are covered with felt, and the poorer fort with rufhes or reeds. The Kalmucks live in the borders of Circaffia in the winter 308 winter feafon, but, when the fpring advances, they proceed northerly, even to Tfaritzin, and return back again as the winter draweth nigh. There are many different hoards, tho' they are all one kind of people, feemingly without mixture; every hoard has a chief, but all their chiefs are fubject to one Prince, called Chan. Their Chan conftantly keeps a refident in Aftrachan, to take care that his fubjects have juffice done them; and a captain prefides over a cantoir, where many writers and interpreters are kept in pay for that purpofe.

The Ruffians pretend, that they are fubjects of their empire : The Kalmucks deny that altogether, but alledge, that they are happy in being under their protection. The Ruffians always keep a refident at the Chan's court, with 2 or 300 foldiers, that he may represent every thing neceffary to the Chan. It was Donduk Ambo who reigned over them, when we arrived in Aftrachan. This prince kept very good order, and was a fevere difciplinarian : There were very few great robberies in his days, but when any happened to be brought to him, who had committed any heinous crime, he caufed break their arms and legs, and let them be exposed to the wild beafts, without meat or drink, till they expired. They profess the religion of the Chinefe, and pay worthip to idols, but acknowledge, that they are only idols to expreis the great great regard they have for fome of their faints. They acknowledge only one God, keep holidays, and have no unbecoming way of worfhip. They praife God by vocal and inftrumental mufic, having at fuch times books in their hands, the notes of which are wrote from the top to the bottom of the page. Their mufic confifts of ftringed inftruments and cymbals, to which they beat time, and indeed it is by no means difagreeable. They have a fpear about eight feet long, headed as other fpears, broad, and double gilt; the neck of the head is encompassed by a ring, to which a leather thong is fastened of about a foot long, to the end of which a piece of lead or other metal is made faft. When they worfhip, one placeth the end of this fpear on the ground, and, by an imperceptible motion of the hand, caufeth the metal turn round, during the time of their worfhip. Upon enquiry, they informed me, that this rotation was an emblem of eternity.

They certainly believe in a future flate, and have fome fingular rejoicing in the time of new moons, by building a fmall tower of earth, placing on it veffels filled with oil and other materials, which they fet fire to, and which exhibits light of different colours, round which they dance, gambol, and fing. They marry only one wife at once, nor muft they know other women during their marriageflate. Their ceremony of marriage is reafonable, fonable, though not agreeable to the cuftoms of any other country I know. It is thus : A young pair, agreed betwixt themfelves, retire, and live as man and wife for one year. If the young woman produceth a child in the fpace of one year, the marriage is completed and lawful; but if not, they either make another year's trial, or part : Nor is the woman in the leaft reflected upon ; fhe is as greedily picked up for another trial by others, as if fhe were a young virgin.

Women, when married, are faithful to their hufbands, for a contrary practice is punishable with death, if the hufband is fo minded, and he is alfo executioner. An example of this I was once very forry to fee. Some young men, belonging to my hospital, returning one evening home from the city, and having been overtaken with liquor, as they paffed to the hofpital by a few Kalmuck tents, they went in, and gave the woman liquor to intoxicate her. The hufband not being prefent when they came there, gave them opportunities of using what liberties they pleafed with the woman. In fhort, it was faid, fhe was caught by her hufband in the very act. He difmiffed her guests without quarrelling with them, thereafter put his wife to death, and, next morning, I, with others, faw him dragging the dead body towards a bridge, from the middle of which he threw her into the river.

Their

Their priefts never marry, but then they have a right, by their law, to go into any man's wife for a night. The men are fo far from refenting this, that they take it as a very great honour done to them. Their priefts have no riches, for they are free to use any thing belonging to any of the Kalmucks, as their own property. They make pilgrimages to China, for inftructions and benedictions from their lama or high prieft.

I hope our reverend fathers will not be difobliged at this narration, as I write nothing but what I have been informed of by many to be true; and, I am of opinion, that few young men, in the vigour of youth, could refift the cravings of the most fensible defires and passions, in a country where there is not only no restraint, but where it is thought to be a part of their duty, and undoubted rights and privileges.

Their burials are very fingular. I was told, that they bury, as we do, in the earth for a certain number of years; for an equal number, they throw their dead into the water, for another they burn the dead bodies; and laftly, at equal terms they expofe the naked bodies on the ground, to be devoured by any animal; but they think, if their dogs eat them, it is a great fign of happines in their afterftate. I am very certain that they drew them out from their tents but a very fhort space, to be devoured by any beaft or fowl, all the time I was

I was at Aftrachan, and that their dogs fed chiefly on them and fifh, till I got a ftop put to it, as the reader will be informed of in the fequel. They make continual wars or depredations upon their neighbours, but particularly against the Karacalpaaks, which obligeth the Ruffians to keep about three regiments of dragoons, and 4 or 5000 Coffacks. upon the banks of the Volga every fummer, to prevent their paffing that river. But generally it happens, that the Kalmucks have done the Karacalpaaks all the damage they could for the year, before the Ruffians can get to their flations; becaufe the Kalmucks pafs the river on the ice, and travel into the Karacalpaak country at the time when they are leaft on their guard, murder and deftroy great numbers, and carry many into captivity, together with their herds and numerous flocks of cattle.

The Karacalpaaks can purfue them no further than the Volga, becaufe, by the time they arrive upon the eaftern banks, the Ruffians have formed their line, and deny them paffage. The Karacalpaaks can only act againft them in the winter feafon, when their formidable firength inhabit the defart on the borders of Circaflia, 5 or 600 verfts from the weft fide of the Volga; wherefore they kill and deftroy all the poor Kalmucks which happen to fall in their way. Of their actions inftances will be given in the courfe of my travels.

travels. The Kalmucks are a very fwarthy, broad faced, finall eyed people. They are indeed very ftrong and robuft ; their nofes are very little raifed above their faces, except at the nostrils, where you observe two large broad holes. The Nagai and Karacalpaaks are a little fwarthy, from their being, I fuppofe, in the fields during the fummer feafon, but in other refpects, they are as well formed as any man in Europe, and their women are very agreeable. The Nagai till and drefs the grounds, in which they fow millet, pulfe, oats, and Indian wheat, with a variety of the finest melons in the world. They live in houfes in the neighbourhood of Aftrachan in the winter feafon, but drefs the land, feed their herds, hunt, and fish during the fummer ; and, for their greater conveniency. live in tents, not very unlike the Kalmucks, but much more cleanly every way.

No broils happen betwixt the Nagai and Kalmucks; for the Nagai inhabit the iflands betwixt Aftrachan and the Cafpian fea, whereas the Kalmucks are obliged to feed their flocks in the defart to the weft of the Volga. Their cattle are dromedaries, horfe, horned cattle, and fheep, very fingular for their tails, called by the inhabitants kardruick. The tails weigh about one-fourth of the fheep. They are very large, rather bigger than any I ever faw in England. In the beginning of fummer, the Kalmucks fhear the hair from the dromedaries, and fell it to the Aftrachan merchants. I fuppofe it is what we call mohair. I frequently have worn cloth made of it. Their Prince always keeps ftrong guards of 20, 30, or even 40,000 warriors about his perfon. Their arms are fcymitars, bows and arrows. They are the beft bowmen, I believe, in the world, learning the bow from their infancy. They never fubmit to afk their lives, and feldom give quarter to any enemy; nor has the utmoft Ruffian feverity been able to curb this barbarous difpofition; it was for this that they were expelled the Ruffian army in the late war againft his Prufian Majefty.

They are the most hardy of the whole human race. I am told, that they eat any thing, and in a march, they would not go a mile out of their way to pass any river a mile broad. They plunge into the water, and proceed with the greatest intrepidity.

CHAP. LVI.

Concerning the Soil, Animals, Vegetables, and Minerals about the City of Aftrachan.

MR Hanway, as was faid, placeth Aftrachan on the long ifland : But the inhabitants, who ought to know beft, call it the ifland of Hares. In the true fenfe, it is not a large a large ifland, for a branch of the Volga walkes it from the north round the east fide. and, at the diftance of two miles fouth, it cafts off a fmall branch which runs ftraight weft, and falls again into the Volga, about a mile or two fouth from the city. The foil, not only of this island, but of the reft, and alfo of the defart, is very light and fandy, but it is fo very much mixed with falt, that it produceth only, naturally, a great variety of Kals, vast quantities of liquorice, reeds, genista aculeata, an herb called Astrachania, nitraria, and others of the like nature. The earth will produce no grain, unlefs it has, during the winter feafon, lain under water; wherefore the Tartars have great dikes, which they open or fhut, as they intend to have grain, or wash out the fait, when they intend to fow a piece of ground, they cut through the dike on the lowest end of the valley, and let out the water which formed a lake the preceeding year, and, in two or three days, from the excellive heat and drought of the climate, it is fit for tilling, then they drefs it, and fow it with what grain they pleafe, and it is incredible what increafe it produces, whether grain or fruits.

They fow many different kinds of melons and pompions which they eat with bread: The water melon, I was told by our countrymen who had been in the Weft Indies and Italy, is far preferable to any growing in these countries: countries : Indeed, I drank little liquor to fatisfy nature, when I could get the water melon; it is extremely healthy, but the other melons are very dangerous, producing agues accompanied with dyfenteries. Aftrachan produceth the largest grapes I ever faw, and very agreeable to eat, though, the wine has a fharpnel's uncommon, which I believe proceeds from the falt of the earth. There are two kinds of mulberries here, the red and the white, the white kind, or a particular kind of white mulberries, had almost killed fome of the Prince's fervants by vomiting exceffively, and if I had not been prefent, and prevented, his children would have fhared the fame fate.

Aftrachan gardens produce very many vegetables, but they muft be frequently watered for the heat and drought is very great, and fhowers are feldom feen here, indeed in the evenings and night-time, there falls a very great dew, dangerous for the ftranger ; but this is far from being fufficient to wafh the falts from the earth : For an hour after fun-rife, the falt lies upon the furface of the earth like a hoar-froft.

The inhabitants of Aftrachan are bleffed with all kinds of tame animals which we have, and by a far greater number of wild than we have, or than I can defcribe ; the following is a fample, wild fwine, deer of different kinds, fuch as the elk, red and fallow deer deer, and the antelope, which in the defart roam in herds to the number of fome hundreds: The laft mentioned is not well known. and therefore I shall give the following defcription of it, which may be relied upon, becaufe I have killed very many. The antelope is about the bigness of a fallow deer, of a white gray colour, the head refembles fomething that of a cow, but its note has no griftle, and feels in your hand as foft as velvet, it has beautiful black, yet bright prominent eyes, they are all purblind, fo that a man may eafily get within fhot of them, they are legged and footed like other deer, they have a pair of beautiful horns, not branched, tapering from the root to the top, they have rings at equal distances from the root to the top, but they are not fpiral as fome write, their flefh is extremely tender and delicious, but I think it has fome tafte of mufk. which was the reafon that I could never eat of it above twice or thrice in one year; They are very fwift, but cannot, in the winter feafon, efpecially, hold it out long; for I have taken them frequently with grayhounds, although, at their first fetting out, they outrun the dogs by far. They are the fineft runners I ever beheld, you would imagine, as they run from you, that they incline very much to one fide, and that their feet fcarcely touch the ground.

Hares

Hares are in very great plenty : I never faw in Aftrachan, nor heard of either bears or wolves, and I fulpect this may proceed from the want of their natural coverts, woods ; for there are no woods, except in the iflands. and in the time of high water, the islands are all covered over, except the higher kind, and the Tartars of all nations are naturally fo keen hunters, that they would foon extirpate any number : Nothing but the fwiftnefs of deer keeps up the breed. There are wild horfes in Aftrachan as I was informed, but I never faw any of them alive, they are run down, and hunted like other wild animals, and it is faid, they are excellent food, which I believe to be true. I have eaten what was called wild horfe, but it was much preferable to any beef.

At an entertainment, my wife being with child, Mr Thomfon, our landlord acquainted me, that there was to be a difh of horfeftakes, and defired I fhould acquaint Mrs Cook, left, if fhe got notice afterwards, it might prove of bad confequence to her : I did fo, fhe did not eat, but I did, our company numbered nine, and except Mrs Cook, every one eat plentifully, and declared they never had caten fo good beef in England, for they imagined it was beef. One Mrs Bell, who loved what was good very well, declared that fhe never had eaten fuch beef in Northumberland, where fhe was born, but after the was informed that it was horfe flefh, the foon turned fick, and threw it up; but I imagine this proceeded neither from the bad quality of the flakes, nor from the delicacy of her conflitution, but truly from the quantity fle had eaten, which was not the most moderate.

Before I leave this fubject, I am obliged to mention one of the most beautiful quadrupeds that I ever faw, it is called by the Ruffians and Circaffians, the wild goat, and is properly a native of Caucafus. I never faw more than one, which was fent as a very great prefent to the Prince: It is faid, that there are many of them, but that they inhabit the most inacceffible mountains in Caucafus, where neither horfes nor hounds can with fafety pafs; wherefore, though they Thoot them fometimes, yet it is very rare that they can catch them alive ; this was living, and did not feem to be old. It was neither fo bulky nor fo high, nor indeed any way refembled a goat, it had no beard, which indeed might have proceeded from its youth: It had a well-proportioned head, with gentle tapering jaws , beautifully prominent, bright fiery black eyes; the head fixed to a long tapering neck, which grew agreeably greater, till it reached the well formed breaft, the body of a very regular length, with a gentle belly, and firong well built posteriors, tapering legs, and cloven hoofs, with a fmall tail like like a deer; it is all over fpotted brown and white, but rather wreathed on the fides. I was told that it is good venifon, but never tafted it; the Prince fent it into Ruffia.

All the world have heard of the wonderful baronetze, philosophers and naturalists were divided in opinion about it, they could not adjudge it to be an animal, nor properly a vegetable: It was faid that the baronetze grew in the kingdom of Aftrachan, upon a ftalk two foot high, from the top of which grew a lamb-like fruit, covered with a fine fur every way refembling that of a young lamb ! Who are ignorant that the Armenian or other merchants fold one to the late King of Pruffia, which he as a very great curiofity. made a prefent of it to the Royal Society? who fuspecting a fraud, asked and obtained leave of the King to diffect it : within the fkin, they difcovered faw-duft or fome other materials with which it was fluffed, and the navel pierced with a flick, which was fo fixed, as to appearance, looked like a falk. It was also faid that no grafs grew within fome feet diftance of this baronetze, becaufe no doubt, it was fuppofed that the monfter eat it up ! for it had a mouth, nor could it mifs ; because it was only a lamb-skin stuffed. So full of this whim, was our Archiator Dr Fisher, that he, at the defire of his correfpondents, wrote to Mr Malloch, cur field apothecary, Mr Swartze, and me, to make all diligent diligent fearch for this wonderful herb, tho' it was then known the Royal Society had made the difcovery I just now mentioned, but no doubt he imagined that though the King of Pruffia had been imposed upon, yet fuch wonderful vegetables might exift. We, obedient to our Archiator, made fearch, we alfo afked all the different Tartars who inhabit the defarts of Aftrachan, and were ridiculed and laughed at, as we very well deferved, these people jnstly wondering that men who were faid to be very learned, could, upon fuch flight informations, be fo very eafily imposed upon ; and from this, inferring, how properly I shall not fay, that much of our learning was certainly chimerical.

TRAVELS.

A Continuation of the History of Animals.

THE plumed inhabitants of Aftrachan are too numerous for me to give an account of them, and indeed, I fcarcely believe that the different nations who inhabit and traverfe that kingdom, put all together, are equal to fuch a talk; I shall however, give a short defcription of a few, leaving the reft to men who have more time, and abler pens than I pretend to. I pretend to. Sf The

The pelican of the defart, onocrotalus or pelecanus being the largest fowl, I begin with it. It is as large as the gray cagle, which I think is greater than the fwan, it is endowed with a very long bill pointed, but broad where it joins the head; the upper half is very folid, but the lower is as it were two horns. from the point diverging towards the head ; betwixt which is a very capacious large bag fufficient to take in a very large fifh, fuppofe a carp, which I have feen them fwallow with cafe, the head is large, the neck well proportioned to the bigness of the fowl, as is the body. the wings and tail are very long to carry fuch a weight : They are of a white gray colour, are great fifthers, and flock together to the number of 2 or 300. They fit upon the banks of the river through the day and nighttime, and only fifh in the morning and evening. When they fifh they fly to a bank, the bottom of which they can nearly reach with their feet, which are webbed fomething like a goofe, and join one to one in fuch a manner, that a fifh can fcarcely pais by them, efpecially becaufe they join their wings to their neighbours, and immerfing them and their fpread tails into the water, form a very great line fomething refembling a crefcent. enclosing all the finall fifh betwixt them and the fhore, to which they proceed flowly. picking up the fifh till they are got on fhore, which they do very nimbly: It is a very harmlefs harmlefs bird, only a great deftroyer of fifh. Where they hatch their young I know not: They tafte fo much of fifh that they are not eaten by the inhabitants, and they depart towards Perfia in the winter. Another there is, which the Ruffians likeways call pelican, the Germans lebel ganfe : The body of it is white as fnow, its legs are long and black, as is its bill, which from round near the head turns an inch broad at least at the farthest extremity, it is full of tharp prickles fit to hold any thing it may catch, it is as white as fnow; and from the hind part of the head grow five or fix long milkwhite beautiful feathers, which the Empress Anne and her ladies wore, placed in fockets of gold on their head-drefs; the body of this pelican is about as big as a Mufcovy duck; they are fifhers, and through the whole day run upon the banks of fhallow lakes, continually directing their broad bill from one fide to the other, that they may readily apprehend their fifh. They are not very delicious food; becaufe they partake of the fifh tafte, though I have frequently eaten, them.

There is another water-fowl called by the Ruffians corovaika, it is all of a colour, but not quite black; it is about the bignefs of a hen, has a long crooked black bill like a fnipe but much longer, it lives and feeks its food on the banks of the rivers and lakes, yet it does not tafte of fifh: Its flefh is brown, but extremely 324 extremely delicious, although it is not fat, it is very tender, it is not fhy. Wherefore they are eafily killed. There are very many fwans, and a very great variety of ducks. I thall only defcribe two kinds which are not known in this country, at leaft I have not heard of them, and I am fo far diftant from any good libraries, that I only can confult my own. One kind is of a brown-red colour, but more red on the breaft than any other part of the body: They fly in flocks, but a little fcattered, and are always near rivers or lakes, though I never faw any of them fwimming. If you happen to kill one of them, all those who heard the report of the gun, immediately take wing and fly towards the place where the fowler ftands ; and if he does not conceal the killed duck, they continue fo long to fly round, making a very mournful tone, that an indifferent good fportfman may kill a very great number of them without altering his fituation : But they are not good to eat, taffing very. dry, hard, and fifhy. There is another kind extremely finall not bigger than a quail, it is very beautiful, exactly shaped like a duck, but the feathers are curioufly diversified with green, white, red and yellow. They are fhy, and I imagine never were eaten. I only once killed one at Derbent with a ball; you have no chance with fmall fhot, as they permit none to come fo near them.

I fhall

TRAVELS.

I shall just mention another water-fowl, and make an end of them. The one I mean is of a white colour, but a little variegated with either black or green. It has two very long legs red as blood, and wades deep into the water ; the bill is red, but from the head it projects in a horizontal figure, and then it makes an angle, and turns downwards towards the breaft. It fifnes by wading, but does not fwim. Every kind of fowls which are to be found on the land of Great Britain, are alfo to be found here, and therefore I shall not defcribe them; only I cannot pafs by one remarkable accident, which happened long after I arrived in Aftrachan. One day walking by a large field of millet, in company . with another, my dog went among the millet and fprung fome quails, fome of which we fhot. A Tartar, to whom the field belonged, came to us. We imagined, before he came near us, that he defigned to chide us for permitting the dog to go among the millet, and would, for that reason, have been glad we had been fomewhere elfe: not that we were in the least afraid of any thing the Tartar could do, but the thoughts of having wantonly wronged a harmless kind of people, were very difagreeable. In fhort, when he came to us, he with great courtefy told us, that thefe birds deftroyed his millet, and that if we liked the diversion of killing them, if we would take the trouble to go into the field among the millet, it was probable we would get 100 for one: He faid he would go to his tent and provide fome delicious melons by the time we fhould return, not doubting but that we would be very thirfty.

We readily agreed to this fcheme, and, as few people flot there, killed a great many. We arrived in his tent afterwards, and obferved, that we did not care to walk among his millet, left we fhould deftroy much with our feet and the dogs. He returned for answer, that it was true that we might deftroy fome, but that men never would deftroy much; and affirmed, that the quails deftroyed more than if many men were to pais through it daily, after it was once headed. He faid, that men naturally, for the love they had for grain, never would rafhly tread it down, but carefully mark their footfteps; that the dogs indeed, faid he, would fhake fome, was certain ; but, he averred, that that altogether would not equal one tenth part of what the quails devoured and fhook.

After this I many times diverted myfelf in this way, and many of my friends, with eating the quail, which, however delicious, were fo fat, that I could make but two or three meals of them in a feafon. The people in Aftrachan alfo faid, that they never had known quails fhot in that neighbourhood before that time. From what is faid, it is indifputable, that here there is no want of wild fowl and the beft quadrupeds in the world; but if the land land produceth fo luxuriantly, the water, the famous Volga, produceth to the full as great variety and plenty of the most delicious fish.

The belugo is the first I shall mention, as the largest in that mighty river. I imagine it is fo compleatly defcribed in Ray's fynopfis methodica piscium, that I may refer the reader to it under the name of Attilus, by Rondel. Bellon. de aquatil. p. 126. Gefn. Aldrov. Adella et Adano, hodie Italis dictis, &c. which he may read, page 113 of the above book. He indeed, and fome others, thought that it was a fifh only to be found in the rivers of Italy, Lombardy, the Danube, and Borifthenes. I imagine that the hufo, attilus, and belugo, is the fame fifh. It is indeed very like the flurgeon in make, but much larger. It frequently weighs more than 1000 lb. A ftone, or rather a bone, is found in the head of the belugo, which, when broken in two, one would imagine, by the colour and lines through it, that it is a piece of mercurius fublimatus corrosivus; but every one knows, that the fublimate is very ponderous, but this is very light. It is kept as a curiofity, and is faid to be a great lithontriptic. I have used it, but cannot fay much to its praife.

In the year 1740, I fent a very large one to my learned and worthy friend Dr Sanchiez, phyfician to the Empress. The belugo is fo much like the sturgeon, and, as faid above, fo well described by the great Ray, that I shall fay fay no more of. The flurgeon is fo well known, that it would take up time needlefsly to fay any thing about it more, than only that the Volga abounds fo much with it, that it makes great part of the fifh-commerce betwixt Ruffia, other countries, and Aftrachan. The Volga produceth white falmon, a very fat and unwholefome fifh ; carp, pike, perch. a fifh as large as a falmon, but not fo good, which the Ruffians call fudaak ; fmelts, and an incredible variety of fmall fifh. I fhall only mention two, becaufe, I believe, they are little known in this country ; the first is the ftirlet, it is made very like to a fturgeon, but never fo large, and has no bone in its body, in place whereof it has cartilages, which may be, and are frequently eaten. This is a most delicious fifh. The biggeft I ever faw weighed only 35 lb. Troy. The other fifh I shall mention is called by the Ruffians fom, and their young foimka. It has a large flat, round head, a mouth in the form of a crefcent, fet full of teeth like an heckle; its neck. and as far as the anus, is of an equal bignes. from thence to the tail it grows gradually finaller. It has fcarcely any fcales, is very much fkinned like an eel, and has large eyes. Some of them are a yard or more in circumference.

The fom is a bold fifh, and will attack a man, and if out of his depth will eafily drown him, being both big and long. He meafures,

if

if old, five feet and fome inches. The Ruffians will not eat of it, becaufe it eats men. The Kalmucks greedily devour it. I have eaten of a young fom, and found it very delicious, the flefh being as white as milk. One day I had very near loft an excellent waterdog, by fome young fom ; long he ftruggled, but at laft got free. Had it been an old one, he would have taken the dog eafily to the bottom. Many men, when fwimming, have been drowned by the fom.

CHAP. LIX.

Concerning the different Methods the Astrachani= ans have to take Fish, cure them, and their Method of making Caviar, called by the Ruffians Ikra.

Would not be thought here to know intimately all their ways of managing thefe branches of bufinefs; yet I hope what I write will be fo intelligible, that any may understand my meaning. I am confident, that many will find it new; and altho' I have formerly written thefe accounts to my learned correspondents, yet many who may read this, never have feen the other.

The fifthers, who live on the iflands of the Volga in zemlenkes, or wooden houses under-ground, catch their fifth with hooks, nets, and harping irons. Though thefe are the inforuments with which we catch fifh, yet I'm perfuaded, that they use them differently, both fummer and winter. With lines and hooks baited they take the flurgeon, and all other filh lefs in magnitude; but very feldom can they take the belugo in this manner; wherefore they make use of a ftrong rope. I, 2, or 300 ells long, and, at the diftance of every two ells or lefs, from one end of the rope to the other, they fix large barbed hooks, but not baited, with their fharp points ftanding upwards, looking over each fide of the The rope thus prepared they place arope. crofs the river, letting it down to the bottom, with the points of the hooks above the rope. and fix a buoy to each end of it. The belugo, which is chiefly taken in this manner, loves to fwim near the fandy bottom of the river, and he fims ordinarily very rapidly ; therefore, whether he is fwimming with or againft the ftream, he has a great chance of being hooked in the belly, because the points of the hooks look to each fide of the rope. If the grip is but finall, he breaks off; but the greateft number of the largeft belugo are thus taken. When the fifther miffes his buoys at the places he put them in, he is certain that a fifh has been there, and fo fails about till he finds them, and then coils up the rope very carefully into the boat. If the fifth is not fpent, he may draw the boat and rope after him him for a long while; but at laft, being quite exhaufted, the fifthers gently draw him near the boat, and, before he touch it, they firike him on the head with an iron hammer, but have the rope ready to let go, if they flould mifs the proper place, for he will fwim a great way, and, if they do not give him rope enough, he would eafily draw the boat, tho' large, under water. Thus to the fifther it is very troublefome and dangerous to take a belugo, though, to a fpectator, it affords very agreeable diverfion.

and

The nets which are used in the Volga are both ftrong, long, and deep : They are from 50 to 100 fathoms long. In fummer they place the net fo as to make the figure of half a circle, out of their boats, and bring the ropes fixed to both ends of the net ashore, at a great diftance the one end from the other ; then, having a great number of men, they pull till they get near the bank, when they row their boats within the net, and, with their barbed irons, they firike the larger fifh, and take them into their boats ; but it requires much patience and great toil. Laftly, they draw out the net with an incredible number of different fish. If a strong old belugo happens to be amongft them, he frequently breaks the net, gets away, and lets many prifoners escape ; fo that the fisher is never glad to fee a large belugo in the net. In the winter feafon they cannot use fuch large nets, but I have have feen them use nets of betwixt 30 and 50 fathoms long ; and the way they do is this: They cut a large fquare hole through the ice on the fide of the river, for extracting the net; then, opposite to that fquare hole, they cut another at a just distance, fo that a straight line drawn betwixt thele two holes forms a diameter to a large circle, which they afterwards form with a number of holes cut thro' the ice, at fuch a diftance one from the other, that they can reach with a long pole. Having now made all their holes, they introduce into the middle hole, far in the river or lake, two poles, for the greater expedition, and fhove one forward on each fide, from one hole to the other, till they meet at the first made fquare hole at the fhore. A rope having been made fast to the end of each pole, ferves to conduct the net regularly, fo as to form a circle, which, with the affiftance of many men, they draw out of the fquare hole.

In this manner, I once, near Aftrachan, faw an incredible number of different fifh taken by a number of men. They catch finaller fifh as big as carp, pike, or falmon, with a barbed harping iron, made faft to a long pole, (which the Scots call lifter,) as we do, particularly in the time of high water, when the fifh play among the grafs; but there are few if any red falmon in the Volga. As every one knows how fifh are taken with bait, I fhall fay nothing of it further, than that I have have feen a belugo thus taken in the winter feafon, which was fo ponderous, that, the fifthermen affured me, it would be, though fixed upon fledges, a large load for two good horfes to draw on the ice.

The Ruffians prepare caviar almost from every kind of fish : Thus, I have frequently, at the best tables in that empire, eaten freth caviar from pike. The Ruffians have three different ways of preparing caviar : The first is the fimpleft and beft, and is truly but a part of the other two operations. Caviar is the fpawn or ova of the female fifh. That prepared for keeping, and for the Ruffian and foreign market, is extracted chiefly from the belugo and fturgeon ; that of the ftirlet is, I imagine, all confumed at home, being extremely delicious food. The only art uled in the first preparation, is, carefully to clear the ova from their membranes and filaments, which they do by fhaking and washing them; then, under a shade, they place them upon a fieve or board, fo that the fuperfluous moifture may drain off. This fresh caviar is fold at Aflrachan at about three pence per 12' ounce. The fecond method of preparing it is, first to cleanfe it, as has been faid, and cafk it up well falted, which is fit either for foreign or Ruffian markets. The third way is, to prepare as formerly, and, when well falted, they put it into a prefs to fqueeze out much of the moisture ; this is called preffed cayiar ;

caviar; but I do not think it good, for it lofes much of the delicious tafte of that prepared the fecond way. I imagine no part of any fifh, at leaft which I have tafted, is comparable to the fresh caviar. The fisher nen have ftages well aired, though the rays of the fun cannot penetrate the roof, where they cut open their large fifh, and either fun-dry them. or falt them, and then pack them up for the market. The finaller fifh, being cut open, and the guts taken out, are fo perfectly fundried, that, upon the banks of the river, they build them up into flacks, and let them fland exposed to the open air till they are shipped off. In this manner they prepare the carp. I have known 100 carp bought from the net for a ruble. In London, their tongues preferved alone, I doubt not, would bring to the filhmonger ten times that value. I have frequently bought a live flurgeon at Aftrachan for three pence, and fo the reft. One is always fure of fifh upon the Volga. The fifhers never would take money from me, but gave gratis, for me and the people with me, as much as we could eat, and fome to carry along with us; and if I gave them a glassful of spirits, they expressed great fatisfaction. I had almost forgot to acquaint the reader, that the largeft, fulleft, and beft tafted cray-fifh I ever met with, are to be found on the banks of the Volga; and, for a penny, one may get as many as fix men can eat. In half an hour, a : BIYES man man accuftomed to catch them, may get a basket full, or as many as he can conveniently bring home.

There are but few reptiles in Aftrachan. I have feen only three different kinds. The first is very rare, it may be two ells long, and is fpeckled yellow and black. I never heard that they hurt any perfon, though fome fay that they are noxious. The fecond kind are fpeckled black and white; they are not fo large as the first, but are quite innocent, unlefs they are irritated, and their number is incredible. In the month of March, first when they make their appearance, they are very feeble, and fcarcely can crawl, and ly in fome pit or hollow place, many of them linked together ; but, as the heat advances, they get ftrength. The third kind is the viper, which is fo well known, that I fhall fay nothing about them. Pollibly there is a greater variety, but I neither was informed of, nor faw any other. There are many tarantulas in Aftrachan, which carry their young on their bodies about with them, where-ever they go. I have had many patients bit by them, but never had any difficulty to cure them, altho' the bite always produceth a very fordid ulcer. There is another infect which I must mention: that is the locust : It is about two inches and one half long, or three at most, of a whitish grey colour, and is accomplished with four wings. It is as big about the body as a filkworm.

worm. They appear about Aftrachan in the end of July, or beginning of August, in fuch numbers, that it is incredible. A fouth-weft wind conftantly brings them like large clouds. Mr Hanway is miftaken, when he fays, that they come from W. N. W. The truth of this I affert, becaufe I obferved them every year. Indeed I believe, that, when they are flying, and a north wind blows, they will proceed fouth. They are a great plague to the inhabitants of Aftrachan ; for, where-ever they alight, they leave but few vegetables growing; however, they never were known to cat the leaves of melons. In the month of August I believe they copulate, and for a long time flick fast together, but at no other time, as I have been informed. I believe that they generate in Cuban, Georgia, Circaffia, and Aftrachan ; and I make no doubt of their generating in all the countries fouth of thefe: but I fuppole, that the extreme frofts in Ruffia deftroy them and their feeds. The Aftrachanians endeavour to frighten them from their fields and gardens, by fhooting, ringing bells. and making great noife, but I fufpect to little purpofe; for I have known them alight in gardens, in fpite of all oppofition, and, before they decamped, would not have left any thing valuable green. When I failed on the Cafpian, I have feen an incredible number floating on the furface of the water, above 50 miles from fhore. There are great numbers of

of finall tortoifes about the banks of the Volga, not exceeding one foot in length, but they are not eaten by the inhabitants, becaufe they imagine they are poifonous, though the cook, who went to Perfia with us, who was an Auftrian, affirmed the contrary, and faid, that he had dreffed them frequently.

Concerning Minerals found about Aftrachan, &c.

NORTH from Aftrachan, about the di-ftance of feven miles, the Ruffians dig up a kind of earth, in a place on the weft banks of the Volga, called fal litri, a corruption of fal nitri, and macerate it for fome time in water; then they draw off the clear water, and, by adding foot and fome quick lime, they evaporate the water, and make as good falt petre as can be made any where. They fay, that this has been an antient city. I doubt not the truth of this, because brick has been found frequently under ground, and money alfo, fome of which, both filver and gold, I have feen, and am in poffeffion of fome at prefent, though the characters are not, I believe, legible*.

The

* Some authors have given out, that the fwallows about this

The men frequently find precious ftones in digging this earth. Whether they have been loft accidentally in former ages, or are natural minerals, I fhall not difpute ; but I am certain, that fome of them are quite rough. and of little value till they are polifhed. One day I bought from a jeweller two unpolifhed rough rubies, found there by a foldier, and two fmall diamonds. The rubies weighed eight carats, and were without blemifh: The diamonds weighed both but one carat, and were polifhed. Thefe four flones were valued by the jeweller at five rubles: I agreed to give him the money next day, but Captain Tandefelt, a Swede, one of Governor Tatifhoff's fpies, went in and informed Mr Tatifhoff, who fent, unknown to me, for the jeweller, paid him the money, and kept the jewels. Indeed, when I challenged him for buying my jewels from a perfon who had no right to fell them, he could give no reafonable anfwer, but defired, that I would let him keep them, and at the fame time made me a prefent of a ring with a large amethyft, but not very good. Many fuch ftones have been found at that place ; and, though they have turned over the earth twice already, and, when this place are of a different fort from our; and tie their young with hairs by the feet, left they fall out of their nefts. Dr Leuch and I made firict fearch about this, and I can affirm, that it is falfe. There is not the fmalleft difference, nor did we find any tied by the feet.

when I was there, were working the fame earth the third time, yet they continue to difcover both ftones and pieces of filver and gold ; but the metal has been wrought, and therefore it is no native of the place. There are very few fresh water lakes in the neighbourhood of the city, but a great many brakifh, very falt, or even covered over with falt, like to ice : Upon fome of them I have walked; and if the falt is broken any where upon the banks of the lake, where it is not deep, the moifture beneath is black as ink, and emits a most difagreeable noifome finell, though the falt is of the beft kind. In fome exceeding brakish lakes, but not crusted over, I have taken up finall cakes of the most excellent chryftal falt. At the diftance of 60 verfts fouth-weft from Aftrachan, there is a large falt lake, about 50 verfts long and 20 broad, fo thick crufted over, that fome hundred horfe and carts are conftantly at work, carrying falt to be put on board veffels riding in the Volga, not only for the use of the kingdom of Aftrachan, but the greateft part of the Empire of Ruffia. This falt-men dig out of the lake with great iron gavelocks. There are two remarkable falt lakes immediately under the fouth walls of Aftrachan, always crufted over in the fummer feafon. The falt is neither pure nor fine, but it has a rednefs in its colour, and finells ftrongly of violets. Poffibly it may receive that particular finell from the

the drains of the city running into the lakes, and volatilizing the falt. Our apothecary took a large quantity of it, and, by many folutions, filtrations and chryftallizations, rendered it as pure as was poffible; yet it retained the fimell, though weaker by much, as alfo the reddifh colour. This was fent to the medicine chancery as a curiofity.

CHAP. LXI.

A Description of the River Volga.

THE Volga takes its rife in Novogorod-Velik, in the lake Troickoi, and further north in different places. It is joined by a canal to the river Mfta, as has already been faid. It has, befides thefe, fo many different fources in different provinces, that it would be endlefs to defcribe all its different heads; for it runs through fuch a large tract of ground, and communicates with fo many different rivers, navigable by finall craft, running from fo many provinces, that it promotes trade and commerce to a greater extent of land than France, Spain, and Italy joined together : But the main body, running from Tweer to Aftrachan, I imagine, if you compute the different turnings and windings, will measure about 3000 verfts, and, on the other fide of Tweer, it cannot exceed 200 verfts :

verfts; and, adding 60 verfts betwixt Aftrachan and the Cafpian fea, its length, from its fource to the fea, is 3250 verfts. The Ruffian corrected map will witnefs that I am not far from the truth, notwithstanding Mr Hanway, according to his incorrect way, makes this river 4500 verfts. The main or principal stream of the Volga glides by the following cities and great mercantile towns : In its way betwixt Tweer and Aftrachan, beginning from Tweer, Cafzin, Uglitz, Oreftma, Koftroma, Pavelofske, Nifni Novogorod, Kuzmudemianík, Kazan, Sinbirík, Samara, Alexerifk, Sizran, Kafzpor, Saratof, Demitzofske, Tfaritzin, Tchorna-yare, Sallitri, and Aftrachan. I hope the reader will excufe mentioning the above places, becaufe my defign in doing this is purely for the ufe of paffengers, that they may run no rifk of being impofed upon, and have always plenty of provision and other necessaries. I have not mentioned the diftances. becaufe, as I never navigated the river betwixt Tweer and Tfaritzin. I know them no other way but by measuring the map, which every one may perufe. I have not fpelled the names of the cities and towns the fame way as those who have written before me, as I hinted formerly, becaufe they have all been foreigners, who were not mafters of the Ruffian language, and have fpelled them fo, that a Ruffian would not understand what they meant; whereas, if any fhall pronounce them, as I have fpelled them, the inhabitants can be at no manner of lofs, which is of the greateft nfe to a ftranger who is ignorant of the Ruffian language.

At Tweer the Volga receives the Tweerka, which is only a branch of the Volga. In its paffage to Aftrachan, it receives the following remarkable rivers, upon which barks and large boats are navigated : Sekfna, Untza, Klyafma, Okka, the Wjatha, and Biclaja, join and enter the Volga in one ftream together with the Kama, Samara : Achtaba is only a branch of the Volga, which is caft off at Tfaritzin, and thence proceeds to the fea, frequently joining with each other, by detached ftreams. Betwixt Affrachan and the fea it is fo divided, that its inhabitants, I am perfuaded, do not know all the iflands and different ftreams; but the principal ones keep near the west bank, and, at forty-five verfts diftance from Aftrachan, run by Earkee, a port belonging to the admiralty, for taking proper notice of veffels outward or homeward bound ; and beyond this, next the fea, are four hills, which, in the Ruffian language, are called Tchatire bugree, where paffengers are detained in fufpicious times, to perform quarantine. On this however there are no proper houfes. The inhabitants of Earkee and Aftrachan fay, that the Volga difembogues itself into the Caspian by fifteen or fixteen ftreams; but, as I faid, they are not very very certain. I shall conclude my remarks about the Volga, by acquainting the reader. that, about the latter end of April, the river begins to fwell every year, and continues to increase for five or fix weeks, but begins to fublide about the latter end of June, and foon runs out by the tenth or twelfth of July. The overflowing of this vaft river is caufed purely by the melting of the ice and fnow covering the immenfe fpace, during the long winter, through which its various branches run; no other caufe of rains having any perceptible effect at Aftrachan, where it rifes in perpendicular height, above its ordinary level, eight or ten feet. It is true, at a greater distance from Aftrachan, towards Ruffia, in fome places it rifes; above the common level, twenty feet and upwards; but this proceeds from the current being confined by high banks and lands ; whereas at Aftrachan, except a very few finall hills in the iflands, there are no high lands on the eaft as far as the eye can perceive any thing. Add to this, that the Volga is divided into fo many large ftreams, as has been already mentioned, that the water gets a free and unconfined paffage into the Calpian fea. At no other fixed time in the year the Volga fwells, and I never knew it fwell by rains, which are very rare in Aftrachan; but I have known it fwell five or fix. feet perpendicular, by ftrong winds blowing from the fouth, if they continue three or four days ; days ; and indeed it will fwell as far up, or farther than Tfaritzin, which many think proceeds purely from the fea-water, though I am of a different opinion. That the fea-water greatly affifts, I have no difficulty to grant; but then it is certain, that very high winds, blowing contrary to the ftream for a long continued time, will ftop its paffage, in proportion to the ftrength of the winds, and level of the country through which it runs; and the level of the country betwixt Tfaritzin and Aftrachan is known to be very great, becaufe the waters do not run two miles in one hour, unlefs they are accelerated by north winds. Mr John Perry, that accurate engineer, makes the Volga to run fomewhat fafter than one mile and an half in one hour: I was told by Mr Poffet (a Frenchman, who kept the Emprefs's vine-gardens in order, of whom I shall have occasion to make mention in the course of this work,) and many of the inhabitants affirmed, that it was true, that the Cafpian fea rofe gradually high, and overtopped feveral low islands, and gradually decreased, leaving them dry every nineteen years. One would be apt to think, that this phænomenon might be caufed by the moon ; but as I intend to purfue my travels clofely and briefly. I shall leave this to be canvaffed by aftronomers. There are very few cities in the kingdom of Aftrachan. Kamfhinka and Saratoff. neither of which I ever faw, Tfaritzin, Tchor-

nayar, and Aftrachan, are the only cities, properly fpeaking, in this kingdom. There was a new city built, at my leaving the place, betwixt Tchornayar and Aftrachan, called Eanataiva Crepust; now Chircaffia is joined to the kingdom of Aftrachan, of which Kizleer is the capital; but as I shall have occasion to defcribe that country in my journey to Perfia, I shall fay no more about it at prefent.

CHAP. LXI.

Of the Garrifon and Government of Aftrachan.

THE garrifon of Aftrachan confifts of fix I regiments, five of infantry and one of dragoons. The immediate chief commander of the garrifon is the commandant, who is commonly a brigadier, though I have known a colonel, but then he cannot command a fenior colonel : But orders iffued from, and in the name of the cantoir or office belonging to the garrifon, where all their affairs are transacted by all officers of fuperior rank, must be obeyed. Each regiment has a feparate hofpital, though in very bad condition, as will be taken notice of in the fequel. Befides the proper garrifon, three or a greater number of field regiments commonly winter here, and 2 or 3000 Coffacks, befides the Tartar militia : For the Kalmucks are not, in Aftrachan especially, much to be trufted. The use of this regular garrifon is to keep watch about the city and citadel; Xx there there are also a detached number of 3 or 400 fent to Kizleer, and a few to Tchornayaz. but none to Tfaritzin : It being garrifoned by the field forces. The irregulars, are never made use of, but in conjunction with the regulars, and to fcour the defart in troublefome times, and bring certain advice of the operations, places of refort, and numbers of these wandering barbarians who difturb their neighbours. This garrifon of Aftrachan feems to have more fatigue, and no better pay than any other garrifon in Ruffia : They are frequently obliged to march into the defarts in the greateft frofts, by which many are frozen to death, they are alfo obliged in the fummer to fell and bring to Aftrachan wood for the use of the garrison hospitals, but chiefly for their officers, as alfo hay: This mal-practice will not be redreffed till they get another fovereign like Peter the Great. I was affured, and have fome reafon to believe it, that this garrifon one year with another. is recruited with 1 500 men, and, that fuch a lofs of men at Aftrachan is peculiar only to the garrifon. I am certain, becaufe I have frequently compared the dead lift of my hospitals belonging to the admiralty, who were kept in the beft order, and had every thing required for the benefit of the fick. whether medicines, eating and drinking, granted immediately with those of the garrifon. When these poor recruits are ordered to march for Aftrachan, they are fent by water to fave charges, and the more effectually to keep them together. They therefore are fent in the fummer feafon, and, by the time they arrive in Aftrachan, the different fruits are all ripe, on which these poor half starved creatures fly with great voraciousness, and in a very fhort time, from a fifh diet upon the Volga for fix or eight weeks, a warm moift air still increasing as they advance nearer Aftrachan, and being lodged in very ill contrived wet barracks, and furcharging all the veffels in their bodies with fruits, which before their arrival they never had feen, far lefs eaten, they contract malignant quartans, and fluxes of all kinds, which very foon reduce their numbers to what I mentioned above. That this might be helped I have no doubt : But as I am not writing about medical affairs, I fhall fay no more of it here, left it may be difagreeable to many of my readers, who will find in the end of this work many observations upon the wretched condition of the garrifon at Riga, over which I had the direction as well as of the army, and what ftruggles I chearfully engaged in, and had fome better order introduced before I left them, which very few inhabitants in Riga are ignorant of, and by which, I hope, the garrifon of that place reaps great advantages to this day.

Concerning the Commerce of Astrachan.

BEING, as I faid before, quite ignorant of mercantile affairs, I can only here give an account of the goods imported and exported to and from Aftrachan : Its merchants from very different nations, not only refide here for a time, but many are born in the place, and through length of time, feeing the advantages and privileges the Ruffian merchants enjoy, which foreigners cannot, they very frequently declare themfelves fubjects of Russia, fo that at prefent many Armenians, who, every one knows, are the natural fubjects of either Perfia or Turkey, deny their allegiance to either of these mighty monarchies, and even, when they refide for a time in either of these empires, boldly claim the protection of the Ruffian ambaffadors, refidents, or confuls. This being the cafe, I may certainly affirm that the produce of Perfia, Armenia, Georgia, India, Buchar, and Chiva, are imported by the Cafpian fea from all these countries; fuch as filks, fattins, velvets, brocades, cotton cloaths of all denominations, jewels, fome drugs, copper and many other things, together with Perfian wines, and variety of fruits and fweetmeats, meats, confections, &c. From Ruffia they transport to Persia, and the other nations named above, but very few goods; becaufe many articles of the produce of Ruffia are prohibited to be exported to thefe nations, though they are allowed to be exported to the different nations in Europe. Thus, iron, hemp, pitch, tar, gun-powder, falt-petre, fulphur, flint-flones and every thing fit for ship-building and war, are reckoned contraband to be exported to any port in Perfia. Meal only but by the immediate permiffion of the Court, is exported: Cloaths of different forts, woolen manufacturies, fish, falt and a few other things alfo are permitted to be exported; the Armenians are allowed indeed to transport European goods. of all forts, except warlike and naval ftores, but they must fell none in Russia, and must buy them with the produce of raw filks of the Perfian growth, or jewels.

The Aftrachan merchants alone are allowed to have fhips on the Cafpian fea, and they generally have betwixt twenty and thirty for fea fervice, which they call heght boats. Thefe veffels carry, one with another, one hundred tuns, but are built very flat like the Holland fhips, and therefore are only fit for the coaft ; becaufe they cannot fail, like the Britifh, near the wind. Befides thefe fea veffels, they have barks for navigating the Volga, barks of a monftrous figure and fize, fome fome of them are more than a hundred feet long, and about forty feet broad, but not much above four or five feet deep, quite flat bottomed, in these barks, they transport fish. falt, &c. to Ruffia ; they are warped up the river against the stream, which work neceffarily requires many hands, not fewer than two hundred. It is true that thefe large barks have each one maft, and a fail of incredible breadth, for the maft is not very long, but it is of no manner of ufe, unlefs the wind is very near right a-ftern. I have been told that they go at the rate of forty or fifty verfts in one day against the ftream and wind, if it is not very flrong : But they neither fail nor warp in the night-time. Each bark is accompanied by three boats, one boat is conftantly at the ftern to receive the rope from the men who are warping, and as foon as they have received the whole length with its anchor, they run away a-head, to drop the anchor in a proper place, whilft the fecond boat is ready to deliver the rope to the men on board, and then falls down to the ftern to receive the rope again : Before the half of this rope is warped into the fecond boat, the third boat lies ready with a part of the rope it has fixed by an anchor, to be delivered on board the boats. Indeed, it is almost incredible how fast by this method, the bark is warped, nor does the ftand ftill one moment through the whole day, if the wind is not very very high; but if the wind is very high, they warp none till it is calmer. The warpers are all accommodated with a broad belt of leather, which lies on the right fhoulder, and is brought under the left arm, to this is joined a piece of fmall ftrong cord with a knot at the end, the warper toffeth the finall rope round the great one, and in an inftant fixeth it, and moves forward as fast as they can go, and when they have reached the ftern of the bark, they immediately difengage themfelves, and return to the head. It is furprifing how expeditionfly and regularly they perform this work. I have been told that if pirates board their barks they call out, and let them know that they are pirates, and order them to fall down on their faces and lie in that posture, till the pirates are gone. They accordingly obey, for they do not love fighting, and the pirates take what they fland in need of, and depart without injuring either the men or bark, but if any look up when the pirates are on board, they run the rifque of being inftantly killed; and if they fight with the pirates, and are overcome, no quarter will be granted, left they be difcovered. The Armenians however fight very bravely, and the pirates do not altogether relifh a combat with them, unlefs they are very numerous, and well provided with arms.

Before I make an end of this chapter, I cannot pass by a piece of history which happened pened this year with the pirates, who were faid to have been about two thoufand ftrong, and very well provided with good arms. They were fo bold as to attack, and murder all who made refiftance, and not fatisfied with plundering paffengers on the river, they carried off from the neighbouring villages whatfoever they flood in need of. The Court having been duly informed of this ordered a regiment of dragoons to march againft them, commanded by a Ruffian colonel: The colonel, not fufpecting any danger near, efpecially as he was marching againft irregular banditti, drove forward for the conveniency of lodging, and left his regiment to march flowly after him, commanded by his lieutenant colonel. Long before he came near the place where they fufpected the pirates to be, one day foon after, the colonel had taken up his lodging, and was repofing himfelf on a bed, a fellow entered the room, and afked him if he was the commander in chief of the regiment? The colonel ordered him out of his prefence ; but. inftead of complying, he called out to his companions, who entered the room in great numbers, and most imperiously stripped the colonel, and whipped him most unmercifully, ordered him back, though he was all over covered with blood, to attend his regiment. and tauntingly told him, that what he had fuffered was only a finall punishment. for not not understanding his duty ; therefore advised him not to part again with his regiment on a march, but added he would do well to advife his fuperiors, that many fuch regiments would find it a hard task to reduce fuch a number of brave well-difciplined fellows as they were. In this however they were miferably miftaken; for the governor of Cazan, having been informed of what had happened to the colonel, ordered the brave Innes, of whom mention has been made formerly at the fiege of Otchakoff; Mr Innes took a very different method of marching, and loft no time to come up with them, and as foon as poffible he difpatched fome fenfible trufty fpies mounted on good horfes, and dreffed as peafants, and he took care to pafs all cities and great villages on the river in the night-time, through bye-roads, and, by this cautious way, he came within a fmall diftance of the place where they were, and was well informed that the pirates imagined themfelves in very great fafety, and were caroufing and making very merry at the expence of the former unfortunate colonel; that they were fo far from expecting any danger that they were encamped on the banks of the Volga, and not on any of the iflands, which they conftant y do, when they dread any danger, and that their boats were at anchor hard by them. The colonel drew his men as near as he could, to prevent his being discovered, and fent his fpies on foot to watch their motions: At laft.

laft, word was brought, near the morning. that they were probably fleeping, as every thing in their camp was quiet. The colonel encouraged his men, who loved him much. to obey command with exactness, and declared, that all his fhare of booty fhould be given to the dragoons : Then he ordered one party to ride up the banks of the river, and another to ride down the banks ; that thefe two parties fhould endeavour to get betwixt. them and their boats, and, at the fame time, fend off a few of the best fwimmers to fecure the boats. Whilft this was transacting, he, with a confiderable division, marched ftraight upon them to prevent their getting into the woods, and in this manner, I was informed, he furrounded them, and took poffettion of their boats. He ordered his men inflantly to fall on the main body, which they executed with great brifknefs; many were killed as they lay fleeping, but many got their arms, and fought with furprifing refolution and conduct. At last however, they were reduced to a very few, and most of them wounded. who, for the love of living a few days longer in the greateft of mifery and many torments. and at laft the most cruel of deaths, rendered themfelves prifoners to the victorious colonel. by whom they were fent to Cafan, tried by the governor, and executed, by hanging. them up by the ribs alive, upon gibbets fixed upon floats. Five or fix men were thus hanged ed upon one float, upon each of which written orders were pafted on the most confpicuous places, commanding, that if the floats flould perhaps be intangled, and fo ftopped from going down with the ftream, whoever flould happen to fee them, flould pufh them off again ; and that whoever flould be known to give the pirates any help or relief, flould be punished with death in the fame manner.

When a report of this transaction reached St Peterfburgh, every one applauded the conduct and bravery of Mr Innes, except fome rich Lords at court, whole villages, as has been faid, had been plundered by thefe ban- . ditti. They accused Mr Innes of granting the fpoil to the dragoons, being, as they faid, the property of their innocent peafants. They infifted on having Mr Innes brought to a court-martial, and tried for the fame. I was informed, that orders were either making or made out for this purpose, when the news of the brave Innes's death prevented any further enquiry. How far Mr Innes was right or wrong, I fhall not take upon me to determine : Nor shall I affert, whether any fet of people, who have fuffered by fuch a refpect-" able body of villains, if I may be allowed to ufe fuch an expression, have any better right than others to be indemnified for their lofs ; nor how it could well be pollible to afcertain that lofs, confidering that many things had been been fold, embezzled, or otherways rendered invifible. But fure none could fay, that the colonel had any gain by it; and as fure he meant to act for the beft ; and, tho' he might have very good reafons to put great truft in the bravery and refolution of his men, it cannot be denied, that, where intereft is in view. it gives additional refolution to the beft troops in the world. Though it were poffible to imagine a body of 1 500 men capable of being quite difinterefted, yet the thoughts of their fighting and exposing their lives to imminent danger, purely to enrich, if victorious, the minions of a court, would naturally damp their ardour ; and, when fuch practice is continued, it never fails to have that effect, and frequently worfe confequences, even the total fubverfion of government. Thus fell the brave Innes, the foldier's friend, and beloved of all good men, whole lofs was justly regreted by all the armies of Ruffia. I neither ever had the honour of his acquaintance, nor any of his relations; and therefore, what I write is intended purely to do justice to the memory of a man, who deferved a far better fate.

Concerning the Occurrences which happened during the Author's first abode in Astrachan.

T is eafy to be conceived, that after our arrival, the fingular parental-like behaviour of the Governor and his Lady to me, caufed every one believe, that I was no finall favorite; and therefore I was not a little careffed by all degrees of the inhabitants. Some wanted to make me an advocate in their affairs, by promifes and prefents, which I rejected with fuch difdain, that I was very foon eafed of a great deal of trouble.

The ice went off the day after our arrival; and, in a few days thereafter, the Governor and his family went by water to fee a filkworm fhade, which an Armenian merchant had, by his knowledge and industry, produced. about two or three years ago. As the method / of propagating filk is very well known, I shall, fay nothing of it here, but that the Armenian had planted the garden with mulberries four or five years before this, in lefs than two acres of ground; and he faid, that he hoped this year would produce near a bale of good filk, and that in the year 1739, this infant factory had produced more than half a bale. The mulberry-trees were but very young, but the Armenian menian got fome affiftance of mulberry leaves from other gardens. I overheard them faying, that the great Emperor Peter had planted a mulberry-garden, for the propagating of filk-worms, at no great diffance from this place. At our return, I, thinking that I was very foon to depart from this city, propofed to vifit the imperial filk-factory, not doubting that I would fee it in much greater perfection, as it was first begun in Peter the Great's time. That I might meet with no hindrance or ftop, I faid nothing to any of the Governor's family, but privately caufed my fervant hire a boat to conduct me to this factory. Accordingly, at the diftance of two verfts from Aftrachan, I was landed on a very pleafant island, on the top of which, near the middle, was built a very long houfe, or rather a long line of houfes, with gardens on the north fide, which, I was told, was the factory. Thither I went, in great hopes of being very agreeably entertained; but how much was I difappointed, when, in this great building, I only found a poor woman, and fome milerable children, who told me, that her hufband was gone a-fifhing for their dinner; that the great filk-work of Peter the Great was reduced to eight or nine worms, only to keep up the name of it, and give bread to this poor, lazy, indolent, and ignorant family of beggars; but I underftood, that an annual fum. allotted by Peter for propagating filk-worms, TRETHERD pretty

Concerning what happened in the Year 1740 at Astrachan.

Began to prepare for my departure for St Peterfburgh : The Prince however encouraged my flay a little longer. At laft, about three weeks after our arrival in Aftrachan, one morning as I paid my refpects to the Prince, and was fully determined to follicit my paffport, the Governor put an Imperial decree from the medicine-chancery into my hand, and congratulated me by faying, that he was glad the chancery had given me a fuperior rank, by conflituting me principal furgeon in the port of Affrachan, in the place of Mr Silvefter Malloch my countryman, and commanding all the furgeons in the fleet, garrifon and army, when they had no principal, or general furgeons in that kingdom, to take directions from me, and report regularly to me every month.

Though it is very natural for mankind to be very fond of fame, and of being preferred to places of honour and truft, effectially when this is effected purely by merit; and though I deny not, that I was much pleafed that the medicine-medicine-chancery took fuch fingular notice of me, who, without any follicitation, had advanced me, though I had only ferved four years, to be director to many very able furgeons, who had ferved the greateft part of their lives; yet I thought I could perceive that this had been effected by fome fecret fervices of the Governor, and made free not to tell him as much; and added, that his Highnefs might eafily think how difagreeable it muft be to any man to have all his hopes at once fruftrated, and that by people of whom he had deferved better treatment.

The Prince, ever the fame man, finiled. and told me, that he had indeed wrote to his friend the archiator, returned him thanks for fending me to have the care of him and his command, and warmly obferved the care I ever had taken of all the fick intrufted to me. and particularly of the advice I had given to defend the people under his command from the plague, at a time when our very near neighbours were fuffering fo much. He faid, that he had prevailed upon me to attend the Princefs and two of her fick children to Aftrachan, and could not help expreffing fome uneafinefs at being obliged to part with me there : And laftly, that he had intreated the archiator to ward off any reproof which I might be liable to from the admiralty, by fome order from the chancery approving of what I had done; and concluded by faying, that that he indeed thought the archiator had fent this order for these reasons; but that, as he had brought me to Aftrachan, he would ufe all his power and policy to get me removed, whenever it fhould pleafe heaven to remove himfelf; having faid this, he put a letter from the archiator to him, in Latin, into my hands, and retired to bufinefs of more confequence.

When I had read the archiator's letter, I could entertain no manner of doubt that the Prince had told me the truth; efpecially when I confidered the whole conduct of this illustrious perfon, which was ever directed by honour and truth. I next perufed the ukanfe, or imperial order, and by it obferved, that, about twenty years before this, the plague had made very great havock in Aftrachan, and therefore required that I fhould, with the greateft diligence, take all care to prevent this difeafe from appearing again, and immediately report to the chancery my having received the imperial decree, and what I found neceffary to be done to prevent the plague being brought into that country. In this order I was informed, that the medicine-chancery, by a memorial of the fame date, had given notice to the college of admiralty, that I was appointed by the hofpital in Aftrachan. in the place of the principal furgeon Malloch. and requiring the college to caufe the commander of the port receive me in that capacity, and to give notice of the fame to every one one concerned ; laftly, to difinifs Mr Malloch from the admiralty's fervice, who was to be employed in St Peterfburgh.

I confidered Mr Malloch's intereft. He was married, and had a wife and children ; I therefore fuppofing that he might not know of this, and, unprepared, might receive orders to march from Aftrachan to St Peterfburgh in three days warning, with his family, (fuch politive and peremptory orders being frequently iffued, many of which I have, to my very great lofs, experienced ;) I for thefe reasons, without loss of time, went to Mr Malloch, and fhewed him the orders I had just received, no doubt thinking it would give him great joy to go to St Peterfburgh, and time to fell off all his household furniture to the best advantage ; but in this I was very much mistaken. I prefently faw his colour ge and come, and, from a chearful ferenenefs, he was quite over-clouded, nor could he hide the confusion he was in from the most ignorant perfon, although he would gladly have made me believe that he was quite fatisfied. In fhort, that very evening, he had intereft enough with the officers, by the fleet, to get a courier difpatched to St Peterfburgh, without lofs of time; and, it was faid, with very refpectable prefents to the gentlemen of the quill, who, hough many of them have fuffered even death fo aking bribes, bestirred themfelves effectually in his caufe, They found found it however quite impoffible to retain him by the admiralty-hofpital, but conflicted him chief furgeon over the garrifon-hofpital, and thole of marching regiments, commanding that he and I fhould monthly communicate to one another whatever happened remarkable in our feparate commands; and that if any infectious alarming fevers fhould happen, in fuch a cafe, we were to lofe no time in confulting together; and immediately, by written reports, to acquaint the government and admiralty, what we thought moft proper to be done, and to fend a fuccinct report of every thing to the medicine-chancery.

Although the medicine-chancery had been very expeditious, the admiralty writers kept back the orders from being fent, eighteen months, as will afterwards appear. In the mean time, I had nothing to do but give attendance to my private patients, and, though I got no falary till orders were difpatched from the admiralty for that purpofe, yet at laft I received every farthing; and, having fpare time, made double that fum by my private patients.

In the month of May, when the air was very ferene and extremely hot, being invited, I went a-hunting with many gentlemen, and the Prince's two eldeft fons. The heat, being greater than any I had ever experienced, obliged me to let down the brims of my hat, and take off my periwig. At our return, only only the Governor's children and I, out of the whole company, who were not accuftomed to fuch hot air, complained of a pungent pain, heat, and itchinels in our faces; but my head, being clofe fhaved, and fhoulders, were as bad as my face. The Princel's anointed her children with fresh butter, but I took no great notice of it : However, next day they were much better, but I fuffered a finart eryfipelas on all these parts, and at last lost the epidermis, which prevented my hunting, except in a morning very early, before the heat grew to great height. I used frequently, in a morning, to go in company with the Governor's eldeft fon, to fhoot. One morning we went to a morals betwixt a rifing ground and the Volga, on the banks of which many Kalmucks had formed a camp. As there was a great fcarcity of water-fowl, we thought proper to feparate, to no great diftance however. I unknowingly approached a hollow place, where many dogs were making a breakfaft on a dead Kalmuck. The dogs inftantly attacked me; I fired my gun among them, but, though I killed one, it had no effect in frightening the reft; I therefore was obliged, with my clubbed fowling piece, to keep them off, by turning round, which exercife I could not have performed long, if the young Prince had not perceived my danger, and refcued me by firing among them. In the mean time, I loaded, whilft they furrounded rounded him, and gave them one other difcharge, which diminished their number, and possibly wounded others. After this they fled to their masters, and we returned home, both in great fright.

In the afternoon, in company with fome young officers, to whom we had related this affair, we went upon the banks of the Volga, and, with our piftols, did not leave a Kalmuck dog alive within two miles of Aftrachan*.

The Prince I mentioned above, was the fame who lately was minifter from Ruffia to the Court of Great Britain, and, at prefent, I am agreeably informed, is vice-chancellor to the Empire of Ruffia. Prince Alexander, for that is his name, was then indeed a most promifing youth; wherefore, I am not furprifed at his prefent elevation, for he was early and effectually taught the beauty of virtue and the deformity of vice, had naturally noble fentiments, which were improved and brought to perfection by the great example of his illuftrious parents.

* I mention this triffing affair, that the reader may fee how dangerous it is to go near thefe dogs accuftomed to eat human bodies. It may appear triffing to fome, and very ufeful to others.

A Continuation of what happened in the Year 1740.

A BOUT the month of June, the brave Kalmuck Prince Donduk Ambo died, it was faid, of a fever. The Ruffian court now intended to appoint one named Donduk Dafchee, Prince over the Kalmucks. They had kept him in Cafan many years in a princely manner, had careffed him much, with a view to get him fo far in the intereft of Ruffia, as to perfuade the Kalmucks to live in cities and villages on the banks of the Volga, and no more wander about the defart in tents.

Donduk Ambo's lady, a Circaffian by birth, defcended of one of the moft illuftrious families in Circaffia, was of a different opinion. She had five children to Donduk Ambo, and very naturally withed that her children fhould fucceed their father ; and therefore at prefent fummoned all the Kalmuck chiefs to attend at her tent. They frankly enough efpoufed her caufe, and determined to keep near her perfon. It was faid, at this time, that fhe had a body of at leaft 40,000 men, all warriors, who had been tried under the orders of the late Donduk Ambo. She encamped on the weft fide of the Volga, overagainft against Astrachan, till the beginning of August, and then marched through the defart fouth to the borders of Circassia, where they wintered, and where I now leave them till next year.

In the month of August, one named Anaftatius, a Greek merchant, arrived in Aftrachan from Buchara : He gave privately an account to the Governor, that, under pretence of going to trade in different parts of Tartary, for which purpole he had obtained proper paffports from Kuli Khan, who, he faid, had conquered Buchara and Chiva, which indeed was very true. He faid, that Kuli Khan had caufed make a very firict enquiry among the merchants who were acquainted with the defarts betwixt Chiva and Aftrachan, about the diftance, water, provisions, the nations who inhabit these defarts, and wanted to know if it was poffible to march a great army from thence to Aftrachan ; and he, Kuli Khan, further enquired of Anastatius many things concerning the forces and ftrength of Aftrachan. I fay, under pretence of going into different parts of Tartary, Anastatius obtained a paffport from the Shach, but, as foon as he thought himfelf to be out of danger of being taken by any Perfian party, he directed his courfe straight to Astrachan, to acquaint the government of their danger. The governor was well fatisfied that no truft was to be put in the friendly meffages which were frequently frequently fent to Ruffia by that tyrant ; as for honour, he never laid claim to any. At this time the Shach had an ambaffador at the court of Ruffia, and was fending two who were in Kizlaar with twenty elephants, and many valuable prefents to the Emprefs and her ministers, being part of the spoils he had taken from the Great Mogul. But all thefe figns of friendship fignified very little, fince it was very well known, that, upon the pretence of friendship, he had frequently invaded his neighbour's countries, and not only deftroved all the best of the natives, but effectually ruined thefe countries, and gave up the fubjects to the most unparalleled cruelties : and all the women, without diffinction, to fatisfy the luft of his brutal army. Soon after Aftanatius had brought this true information, it was corroborated by many others, who had fled from the cruelties of the monftrous Kuli Khan. He had marched his army against Buchara in the year 1740; the Prince of which country, finding himfelf unable to ftand out against fuch a numerous army of devils, caufed open the gates of his capital and the other cities belonging to him. and fued for mercy, which for once was granted, alledging that the Prince of Buchara was the true defcendent of Mahomet, and therefore ought to meet with adoration from all the true believers. Kuli Khan took nothing from this prince, but begged, that he would would grant him one of his daughters, that he might raife up a progeny of the defcendents of Mahomet, who might in after ages fway the sceptre of Persia. This favour was eafily obtained. From Buchara he marched directly for Chiva; but these brave ignorant people did not properly receive him, but upbraided him in the groffeft manner, which raifed his paffion to fuch a height, that he fat down before their city, and in a fhort time made very many large breaches in the walls, and particularly overthrew one very ftrong battery, in which the deluded inhabitants placed their greateft hopes. When he was giving the neceffary orders, and making difpolitions for an immediate affault, the inhabitants begged for mercy, and opened their gates. The Shach, at this time proceeding with good policy, ordered firong guards to take poffeilion of the gates, and, by found of trumpets, difcharged any of his army to cnter the city, or in any fhape molest the natives or foreign merchants, who might be found there : He next cauled a ftrong party enter the city, patrole the fireets, and place fafeguards at the gates of all the caravanferas in it, forbidding either natives or foreigners, on pain of death, to appear in the ftreets, till further orders. Next he caufed feize the Khan and his counfellors, whole heads were chopped off. Next day he declared a general pardon, and permitted foreigners to bring their prefents 3 A dinamons' prefents to his camp. This account I had from a countryman who was prefent, and believe every word to be true.

After he had conquered thefe inhabited countries, he could proceed no farther for defarts infefted by wandering hoards of Tartars, which inhabited the defarts betwixt him and Aftrachan; and underftanding from every perfon, who knew thefe defarts, that it would be quite impoffible to march his army thro' them, he garrifoned Chiva, and the other towns belonging to that principality, with a numerous body of men, and returned into Perfia by the way of Aftrabat, Mezanderan, Cafbin and Ardevil, with a defign, as was given out, to punifh the rebellious Lefgee Tartars: Of which expedition, and his fuccefs, I fhall give the hiftory in a more proper place.

Continuation of what happened in the Year 1740.

UPON being well affured of the truth of Anaftatius's information, the careful Governor loft no time in acquainting the court, and in caufing ftrong lines to be drawn round the fouth of Aftrachan, at the diftance of one verft from the city, well ftrengthened with batteries, upon which cannon were fixed. He fent into the defart many parties of dragoons dragoons and irregulars, to watch the motions of whoever paffed thefe defarts, and to bring him all intelligence. He difpatched orders to the refident and conful in Perfia, requiring them to fpare no coft to get all the intelligence possible of the defigns of Kuli Khan.

In the latter end of July, nincteen elephants arrived on the weft banks of the Volga, with an ambaffador called Huffein Khan, and a great number of attendants, in their way to St Peterfburgh. The principal ambaffador, Sadar Khan, a great favourite of the Shach, died of a flux at Kizlaar, and the one who came with the elephants, wanted much to have wintered in Aftrachan, threatening to return to his mafter in cafe of a denial; but the Governor let him know, that in Aftrachan there was neither provision nor conveniencies for his retinue, being five hundred men and elephants ; that he was at full liberty, either to proceed on his way to St Peterfburgh, or return, when he flould be efcorted with four regiments of dragoons under the orders of Major general Apraxin, who had convoyed them from Kizlaar to this place. The only liberty which this ambaffador could obtain, was to be permitted to go into a bagnio with a few of his followers. During his flay in Aftrachan, (which was only a few hours.) all care was taken, that neither Perfians nor. Tartars were permitted to go to him, except fuch in whom the Governor could confide, and and who had their inftructions given them. I went over the river to fee these monsters, . in company with the field-apothecary, and as we could not fpeak with the Perfians, and the dragoons being at fome diftance from the elephants, becaufe the horfes were terrified for them, we went to one who feemed to be the largeft, with two finaller female ones, one on each fide. They were all chained by the hinder legs with ftrong iron chains. The male elephant made great noife, and with his trunk ftruck the ground fo very ftrongly, that we thought the earth trembled. Little, did we know the danger we were in, nor the reafon of all this paffion, when a little Indian got up, from among the hay which the beafts were eating, with a lance in his hand, made figns for us to retire, fpoke angrily to the elephant, and then thrust the fpear many times into his fides. At laft, after he had thus punifhed him, he again fpoke, but the beaft did not feem to relifh this treatment, wherefore he began again to wound him with a very broad fpear, when at length the monfter made a particular kind of noife, and laid his left fore leg outward, upon which the Indian crept, till he got on his back, from whence he moved forward, till he was feated right behind his ears; then he took an ax, fuch as we break fugar with, only on the oppofite fide to the cutting edge, was a pike about a finger-length, with which he beat the beaft on the head, and fpoke to him betwixt every blow, till he had punished him fufficiently. A man paffing by, who fpoke the Ruffian and Indian language, told us, that we had been in great danger, and that the beaft was very angry that we approached fo near the females; that this elephant was the only one in the. number, who was not as yet rightly tamed, and therefore very dangerous. This was not faying much for the natural fagacity of the elephant, though ever fo wild, to be jealous of the apothecary and me with his miftreffes; but, on the other hand, it is certain, that those who are well tamed, and used with mankind, do behave in a very extraordinary manner. An inftance of which, for the entertainment of the reader, I'll venture to give as I was informed by General-major Apraxin. It is this :

When they went out of Kizlaar, many of the inhabitants went to fee the elephants; among the reft was a felf-fufficient proud prieft, ftrutting with great ftatelinefs to expofe his importance to the common people. This clod of pride the general fpied, and privately fent one of his fervants to defire the governor of a very large elephant, but quite tame and docile, to frighten the prieft without hurting him. At the Indian's pronouncing the word of direction, the elephant reared his long trunk in the air, made a great noife, and approached the prieft. The multitude fled, but but the elephant kept clofe to the prieft, who fled into the defart. As he paffed near a large pit made for catching wild beafts (which will be defcribed when I arrive in Circaffia) . about eight or nine feet deep, he ran to it, and jumped in, there thinking he would be fafe. The beaft followed, and immediately, I suppose as directed, threshed on each fide of the pit, which was loofe ground, fo violently, that the earth tumbled down upon him ; wherefore, he was obliged to fcramble up, left he had been buried alive. However, when he was very tired, and effectually frightened, the elephant went away, and the prieft was carried home, as was reported, in a very homely flinking condition, nor did he recover his fright foon.

I faw thefe creatures go away, conveyed by four regiments: They moved from the fouth fide of a hill, northward, up the banks of the Volga. It is incredible how frighted the Ruffian horfes were for them, the flouteft dragoons could not command them to go near. On the back of one of the largest tame elephant, they had a machine fixed, where two or three men could fit, railed about. I was told, that the ambaffador, in company with one or two more, ufed fometimes, in a pleafant day, to fit there for a day's journey. Although, as has been observed, their chains were very weighty, yet they dragged them with great eafe ; and their ordinary walk requires

eiving me time to return an wer, into

T Had been in Aftrachan about two or three weeks, when one afternoon Paftor Wife payed me a vifit : He afked me, If I was of the reformed religion ? I anfwered him in the affirmative. He faid that he had been informed fo, and told me that he rejoiced at it, and faid he doubted not that I adhered to the kirk of Scotland. I faid I did, and at prefent believed I fhould not change, tho' I began to entertain a very good opinion of the church of England. He faid that of the two he loved or effeemed the kirk beft, but that he alfo had a very great opinion of the purity of the doctrine of the church of England; and that the English church had produced fome of the most learned divines in the world. Then he afked me, Why I had not been at church fince my arrival in Aftrachan? I faid, that I underftood the German language very imperfectly, nor did I know the method of worship in their church, never having having once been in any, that I fcarcely could read the German print, and that I looked upon every one, who pretended to join in divine worfhip with others whom they did not understand, to be hypocrites. He begged I would entertain no fuch opinion, that I would come to church, and made me a prefent of a German bible, faying, that if I réad it frequently, God would affift me foon to understand the language, and, without giving me time to return an anfwer, immediately kneeled down, and prayed. He was, I dare fay, a very good man; but a great enthufiaft. I accepted of his bible, and indeed foon learned the German language, but this was owing to my daily keeping company with the Germans in Aftrachan.

Mr Wife told me, that he had been preacher to Count Muinich, but that, at the earnest defire of Brigadier Younger, and the gentlemen belonging to the garrifon, he came there: But faid, that it was expected the brigadier would foon leave this place, and, when that fhould happen, he would go with him ; because Colonel Pile, the eldeft officer belonging to the garrifon, bore him a grudge. nor had paid him his falary, according to his fubscription, for one year bypaft, and that many others had done the fame thing ; becaufe he had reproved him for feizing the effects belonging to one of Prince Dolgaruka's family, after his death, though he had left a wife a wife in no very opulent circumstances. He faid, that the Prince had a great liking to the colonel's lady, and that fhe had, in his laft days, perfuaded him to this, and that he had granted a will in her favour, in prejudice of his own wife, which he thought not only difgraced themfelves, but would have brought a reproach on the foreigners, if he had not burnt the will, and fo forced them to deliver up the Prince's effects to his widow. I afked him, How he attempted to burn the will? or how he got pofferfion of it ? He faid, that foreigners were fo univerfally feandalized on this account, that he went to the house and expostulated with them; but finding that this ferved only to inflame them against him, he defired to fee this will, that he might fay whether it was genuine : Accordingly the will was produced, and when Madam had gone into another room, he committed it to the fire in prefence of the colonel, who was fo old and fliff that he could not reach the fire till it was confumed : And this finished, and faid, he prefently withdrew, and never entered the house again. They fwore revenge, but were obliged to reftore every thing belonging to the deceafed Prince; and hitherto the brigadier had protected him. Of this I gave our governor a very fuccinct account, who next day fent, and defired the paftor would dine with him : He fent alfo for the colonel, and after dinner gently fpoke of that 3 B that affair, and told Mr Wife, that if any, in either garrifon or army, had figned a call for him to come as parlon to Aftrachan, and had annexed a certain fum of money : And if, at any time, any of these officers refused to pay the fum they had voluntarily fubfcribed; upon Mr Wife's complaint, he would order payment immediately, and a ftop to be put to their falary till all was clear. He told him alfo, that he would protect him, and every honeft man, as long as he governed that kingdom, let their religion be what they pleafed. The governor pronounced this fentence with fuch a determinate countenance, that next day the poor parfon got all his demands paid up: But the colonel and apothecary fwore they never would enter the church as long as Mr Wife was there; which oath was alfo broken, when the apothecary buried his fon. By their rules, the dead body is brought into church, when a fhort fermon upon luch occafions is preached before burial : In that fermon, the paftor lashed them very feverely before the whole congregation. He faid, that men that had bound themfelves by oath never to enter the church fo long as paftor Wife preached there, but God had determined that they flould enter the church either dead or alive. He faid, that whoever were fo foolifh as to make fuch promifes. did not attend to the will of God, who it was evident, by the melancholy example before us, was determined to bring them upon fuch occafions, and advifed them rather to walk into the church, as their duty required, or elfe God would caufe them to be carried into this houfe when dead, and when it was dubious whether they had a chance for falvation. He, I thought, upon this occafion, carried his refentment too far, and, in place of cementing differences, made, as he well might have forefeen, the breach not only wider; but provoked other people, and in fhort was foon thereafter, in company with the good brigadier, obliged to leave Aftrachan. I was informed that he went to Pruffia, and was much carefled in that kingdom.

Concerning Monsieur Pierre Posset and his Adventures.

I Had been but a fhort time in Aftrachan, when I was made acquainted with a French refugee called Pierre Poffet, who gave me the following relation of his adventures. He was at that time about fixty years of age ; and Mrs Poffet, both French, was fifty. Mr Poffet faid, that when he was very young, his father was taken up and broken on the wheel, after he had fuffered unheard of tortures ; and a fmall eftate which belonged to their their family was annexed to the crown of France, because he openly professed the Reformed Religion, nor would renounce it to the laft. Mr Poffet was, when his father fuffered, nine or ten years old : He was his only child, and was fent to a monaftery, to be educated according to the Roman principles : But after the priefts had half flarved him, whipped, and otherways tortured him. finding they could not prevail, they appointed him to work hard in their gardens daily under fevere discipline : At last, however, he got an opportunity, and, in great danger, efcaped. He faid, that as he had great reafon to be diffatisfied with their unheard of cruelties, he loft no opportunity of doing them all the injury he poffibly could during his flay there, which was about three years, and very feldom was fulpected. When he had efcaped, he went begging thro' France, till he was prefied into the King's fervice, as a dragoon, where he ferved till the King of France loft a battle on this fide the Alps. At which time, the Reformed, who were in the royal army, deferted in a body, and fled into Tirol, and thence difperfed through Germany and other countries. Poffet took his road to Holland, from thence into England ; betwixt which countries, having gotten fome fmall flock, and credit from the refugees in London, he traded fome years, and married in Holland. At laft, he went to Ruffia, Ruffia, and, as futler, he followed the Ruffian army to the fiege of Aloph, which was the first expedition Peter the Great made againft the Turks. When Afoph was taken, Poffet had interest to be appointed, with a good falary, overfeer of the vine-gardens in Aloph, and continued there till Aloph was again reftored to the Turks, by the unfortunate treaty of the Pruith. During this time, Poffet, who had knowledge in commerce, had made a pretty fortune : But inclined to go to Aftrachan, where he was appointed principal over the Emperor's vine-gardens, by a contract during his life, by which he was to have good houfes to dwell in, and the whole produce of the garden for his maintenance, except what fruits might be required by the Court, and forty men maintained at the Empire's expence to work in the garden, which garden was at least forty acres of the best ground.

Pierre was thus employed long before I arrived in Aftrachan, and alfo continued in the fame way when I left it; where he had made a very great fortune, and had a family of two fons and a daughter. His eldeft fon was lame, and died there, his fecond, Cornelius Poffet was fent as futler to Afoph, the laft time it was befieged and taken, as has been already noticed, by the late ever victorious Field Marfhal Count Lacy. Young Cornelius, who abhorred being a futler,

He gave credit indiferiminately to all the officers who were in want, and only took their notes of hand. When he was reduced, and his father would not anfwer his demands, he entered into the army as volunteer. It was not long before he was advanced to the rank of ferjeant, and, what is very remarkable three or four days preceeding the capitulation of Afoph ; he went a volunteer to the florming of a breach three different times, and, agreeable to the Ruffian regulations, every time he was advanced one rank higher; fo that when the city capitulated, he was captain of dragoons, and in that quality marched with us to Perfia, in which expedition he behaved fo well that he was advanced to a majority when we returned.

Old Poffet in his younger days fuffered much mifery, and, as he has frequently told me, efcaped many imminent dangers: But one he efcaped at Aftrachan, which was well known to all the inhabitants, and which for its fingularity, I think deferves to be related, as it will I doubt not be agreeable to the reader.

I faid, that he had a good house in the vine-gardens. This house, in which he lived, was built of timber, two stories high, which formed one fide of a square, facing which was another house, in which the labourers of the garden dwelt, and a large gate, which formed another fide ; ftables and other neceffary houses made a third fide, and the fourth was finished with palifadoes betwixt it and the garden. Poffet was univerfally accounted one of the richeft men in Aftrachan, tho' he made no great flew of it: He was the principal banker in or about the city, and his houfe was well furnished with the best and largest quantity of filver-plate and porcelain.

was

One night, as they were going to bed, a violent knocking at the door fummoned him to enquire into the caufe. He was answered, that it was an express from the Governor, requiring his immediate attendance in his palace, and that there was an order for him. Sufpecting no harm, he opened the door, and foon was made fenfible, that he was at the mercy of a band of robbers, confifting of 40 men, armed with knives and bludgeons. They told him, that they had carefully fecured his men by barricading the door, and placing ftrong guards there, and alfo at the window ; therefore defired him, without further trouble, to give them all the money and value in his house. Poffet, feeing there was no help, affured them, that, if they would fpare his life and Mrs Poffet's, he would inftantly deliver to them every thing in his houfe. This was agreed to, and Poffet kept his word, but they, not regarding their promife, most unmercifully

unmercifully beat both Mr and Mrs Poffet, ftripped her naked, and tied her to a tree in the garden, though it was extremely cold weather. They also tied Mr Poffet's hands and feet together; and, as one of them was taking a long knife out of its fheath, to cut his throat, whilf he was putting up his fupplications to heaven for the fafety of his foul. all hopes of relief having vanished, an old foldier, whom Poffet kept to take care of the ftoves, and do any little work about the house, had escaped the robbers fearch in the garret ; he made fast the entry into the garret, and, from a window, called out, as if he had been directing a captain how he might difpofe of his men to catch all the robbers. The robbers overhearing that an effectual affistance was fo near, in the greatest consternation and hurry, evacuated the house, and made their escape through the vinc-garden. The foldier, feeing that the coaft was clear, loft no time in letting the labouring people out of their confinement, and releafing Poffet and his wife, almost frozen to death. The villains had carried off all his plate and money. Poffet not thinking himfelf as yet fecure, efcorted by a few of his workmen, went to the city about half a mile diftant, and applied to the commandant, who fent a company of foldiers to watch his houfe. Another company was directed to patrole the fireets with great fecrecy; while other foldiers, dreffed dreffed as boors, were fent into fuch houfes as fold liquor, with orders to fecure all fuch boors as changed rubles or ducats, for examination. Before noon next day, the greateft part were taken, and Peffet recovered almost every thing, though, no doubt, he was at fome expence in employing fo many people. The foldiers got little more than meat and drink, becaufe they are not allowed to take money for doing their duty. These miferable banditti, after the most exquisite torture, finished their wretched lives, by being broken on the wheel, or hung up by the ribs, till they expired, except a few who died in prifon. After this, Mr Poffet never durft live in the country, but retired to the city, where he was living when I left Aftrachan, in the year 1748. Scarcely any thing is more agreeable to mankind than to know the manners, cuftoms, or fashions of different nations; and this curiofity prevails with the bulk of the human race all the world over, therefore the following need to furprize none.

Mr Poffet was accuftomed to hire from the Tartar Muzías, a number of their men, in the fpring time, to drefs the vine-gardens, for he had fine gardens his own property, into which he never permitted the labourers belonging to the Empire to enter, left they might have accufed him of employing them in dreffing his own gardens, which would have rifk. ed his forfeiting them: He therefore was well acquainted acquainted with the Tartar Muzfas, who had been many years hospitably entertained in his, Mr Poffet's, houfe; they therefore prevailed with him to go with Mrs Poffet, in the fummer-time, to their camp, to take a dinner. obliging themfelves to put no reftraint on either of them, which the difference of religion. (they being all Mahometans) might have probably occafioned. It is well enough known, that the Mahometans are very careful to keep themfelves very clean, by bathing, depilation, or taking off the hair which grows about the greater emunctories upon the body, and by frequent daily abhitions, particularly before and after repafts. At Mr and Mrs Poffet's arrival, dinner was ferved up, confifting principally of mutton and fowls. After dinner was over, Mrs Poffet expressed fome defire to vifit their wives, which was complied with. She accordingly was introduced into a large tent, where many of the Muzfas wives had affembled, no doubt to fee and converfe with a Chriftian, with whom they very rarely, if ever, had any correspondence. The men had not long retired into their former tent, to converse about their affairs, till they were alarmed with a great foreaming among the women, but Mrs Poffet's voice was heard much louder than any of the reft ; whereupon Poffet, forgetting that it was dangerous and very rude, immediately ran to, and, without any hefitation, entered the womens tent, where he fpied the Tartar women fitting oppofite to Mrs Poffet, exposing what modefly requires should be hid, and two of them wanted much to explore what Mrs Poffet would have kept fecret. Mr Poffet immediately refcued his wife, and the Tartars were no ways diffatisfied with Poffet's going into their wives tent. Mr Poffet faid, that he frequently went and visited the Tartars, but Mrs Poffet never could be prevailed upon to repeat her visits. The old woman acknowledged the truth of this. Historical examples, of themfelves not difagreeable, ferve not only to amufe young readers, but more effectually to fix in their memories the cuftoms and manners of countries, and, as it were, force them to learn geography better than any fyftem whatever ; which is one reafon why I fometimes have related ftories of themfelves not very interefling, for which, I hope, the learned reader, if he has good principles, will pardon me.

he

Concerning different Affairs which happened this Year.

A S no orders were fent from the admiralty, A appointing me to take care of the fick belonging to the port, I had much time on my my hands, and thought it my duty to give my opinion about the proper way to prevent the plague from making its appearance in Aftrachan. I therefore gave in a petition to the precawfe or government's chancery, and fent a copy of it to the medicine-chancery, chiefly reprefenting, that we could not be free of the danger of getting the plague in fuch a very hot kingdom as Aftrachan, unlefs the inhabitants were ordered to keep every thing as clean and free from putrefaction as poslible, both without and within doors, which I imagined would not be difficult to be done, if the following rules were carefully attended to. I observed that the common people byried their dead in the churchyards, both within and without the city, very fuperficially, fcarcely covering the coffin half a foot with earth ; which, confidering the loofenefs of the foil, gave the greatest chance to promote the difcafe we were fo much afraid of ; and that many were buried in churchyards not fenced about, fo that horfes and carriages drove frequently over the graves, and, in this dry climate, rendered the earth finely pulverized, which was eafily carried away by the first guft of wind, exposed the coffins to view a very few days after interment : That the noifome finell, and a vifitation of the churchyards, would prove what I had afferted, to be true. I therefore defired, that, without lofs of time, this might be altered, by ordering the church-churchyards to be fenced in, or by preventing wheel'd machines or horfes ever to pafs through these places; and laftly, to order the graves to be made very deep. I next reprefented the loathfome manner in which the Kalmucks exposed their dead, not only in the neighbourhood of Aftrachan, but under the walls of the city, where dogs, crows, and fwine were daily to be feen feeding upon them, to the great fhame and danger of a well regulated government. I therefore required, that, fince it was contrary to their law to bury, they flould be obliged either to burn them, or caft them into the Volga. I next took notice of the dead-houfe being not a verst distant from the city, the putrid exhalations of which, when the wind blew, might be observed to be very offensive, on the leefide, at the diffance of three verfts. This being an unanfwerable proof that the inhabitants of the city were daily obliged to refpire air much faturated with one of the well known caufes of the plague, I begged that, whatever the archbishop and his priefts might alledge to the contrary, the prefent dead-house should be filled up, and a new one crected at a reafonable diffance from the city. Laftly, I demonstrated the danger of permitting the merchants to form many great flacks of fat fifh about the city, and begged that a ftop might be put to this practice ; and that the freets and houses in and about the city be kept fweet fweet and clean. I next fubmitted to their confideration, Whether it would not confiderably tend to the prefervation of this kingdom, if they gave directions to their refidents and confuls attending the empires and principalities of the neighbouring nations, to make known to the princes and others concerned, in the most express and public manner, that none of their fubjects fhould be admitted into the kingdom of Aftrachan. unlefs they had a teftimonial of health, fubfcribed by the Ruffian refident or conful? That, to prevent effectually any people from entering into the kingdom, flrong guards should be appointed in different places, to caufe all fuch, who came without the proper testimonial, remain in quarantine for three months in fummer, and fix weeks during the winter.

My petition met with all the fuccefs I could expect from the governor of Aftrachan, and alfo from the medicine-chancery. I was the better pleafed, that all the inhabitants were quite well affured it was defigned for their good. None objected to any thing but the archbifhop and Kalmucks. The first faid, that none had a right to appoint him a place where to form the dead-houfe; and the last, that it was difagreeable to their religion to be obliged to throw their dead into the Volga; but both were forced to fubmit to thefe regulations. The proud bifhop bore me a grudge for this this ever after, tho' he could not have fnewed his diflike to one who valued it lefs than I did.

The archbishop, three or four months after this, childishly enough, intended to affront me in the following manner: He had a houfe and church, built upon one of the branches of the Volga, diftant about one verft eaft from Aftrachan, near to which were fome fwamps and lakes, well flored with a variety of waterfowl : Thither I went in a boat, to take fome diversion with my fowling-piece. At the hearing of a fhot, the bishop sent five or fix fervants, with orders to take my piece from me: As they approached, I drew near to my boat, which lay covered under the bank of the river, out of fight. When I was within call of the crew, I demanded what the priefly people wanted ? With much impudence, they faid, that the archbishop had fent them to take my gun from me, becaufe the ground belonged to the church, and he allowed no creature to be killed there. I faid, that I was certain the ground was the Emprefs's, whom I had the honour to ferve, and that I had a very good right to divert myfelf innocently there, as well as in other places, and defired them, if they valued their fafeties, to keep at a due distance, otherways I was determined first to let them experience what the gun was charged with, and next to treat them as robbers. Our difcourfe was overheard by five failors who were in the boat; they inftantly made made their appearance, armed with fliffened ropes in their hands, which the failors in Ruffia frequently carry in their pockets, and therewith, without the finalleft ceremony, exercifed their dexterity upon the backs of thefe fools fo well, that they foon took to their heels, and happy was he who firft reached the bifhop's houfe; for the failors would not leave off, though the bifhop called to them from his window. After which time I never was more troubled by him.

CHAP. LXXI.

Concerning the Death of the Empress Anna Ivanovna, &c.

O N the 17th of October, old flile, the Empress Anna Ivanovna died at St Petersburgh. She was the only daughter of the Czar Ivan or John (elder brother of Peter the Great) who furvived Peter the fecond. She was married to Frederick-William, Duke of Courland, in the year 1710, on the 13th of February O. S. but the Duke died in January 1711, and left no children. His Lady, the Dutchess, reigned in Courland till the year 1730, when, after the death of Peter the fecond, she was declared Empress on the 29th of January the fame year. As this affair, fo far as I know, never has been made public, public, and, as I was informed of the following things by many perfons who had a fhare in them, efpecially as I hope it will be agreeable to the reader, I shall give him an account of what paffed at this time, as briefly as I can.

At the death of Peter the fecond, the lords, who were at the head of affairs, detached to Courland many noblemen of the first families and rank in Ruffia, among whom was Prince Michael Golitzin, the fame with whom I went to Aftrachan. They conducted her from Courland to a village within feven verfts of Mofcow, with all the ceremonious pomp to which her high birth intitled her. Here however fhe was defired to halt, till fhe had figned an instrument, which was made out by the great lords in the regency, by which fhe was declared Empress of all the Ruffias, &c. according to ufual form ; but it was required, that fhe, on her part, fhould oblige herfelf, and her heirs, to take into her and their councils, eight or nine noblemen, chofen from the families of Ruffia who were at the head of affairs at this time, of which number the Dolgaratti were the principal. The Empress did not relish this unexpected attack upon her power, which fhe thought was her birth-right: but, by the advice of her friends, the chief of whom was a Courland gentleman, Mr Byron, now Duke of Courland, fhe figned the deed, hoping for better times, and made ready for her her entry into Mofcow next day, through many fuperb triumphal arches prepared on this occafion.

The lords of regency, full of fecurity, as they thought, next morning fummoned the guards, and all nobility and gentry, to make their appearance in the metropolitan church. in order to confirm this agreement or deed by their oaths. A gentleman, Vafilic Nikitetch Tatifhoff, afterwards governor of Aftrachan, who was only a lieutenant, flanding near the altar, as foon as the deed was read, and the gentlemen first in rank were defired to fign it. and give their oaths, declaring, that they would fland by it with their lives and fortunes, unaffifted by any, jumped into the chancel, and, with a loud voice, called to the guards to hear what he had to fay. The great lords ordered to knock him down : but the guards furrounded him with their drawn broad fwords, and declared, that Mr Tatifhoff fhould be heard, and threatened to put any to death who fhould offer the least hurt to him. Silence enfuing, Mr Tatifhoff began, by telling them what they very well knew, viz. That their government of Ruffia was abfolute, and fuited beft with their empire : That the guards, who were gentlemen, other gentlemen through the whole empire, and many of the nobility, were altogether excluded from this fettlement : That only nine families were mentioned, nine out of which

which were to be chosen as hereditary counfellors, without whole advice and approbation, the Emprefs and all her fucceffors could do nothing of the fmalleft importance. From this he drew a certain confequence, that none would have the least chance for preferment in the empire, but the cadets of their families, or the most obsequious to their interests; and confequently he, Tatishoff, and all other gentlemen, might, with certainty, bid farewell to the hopes of advancement, let their faithful fervices deferve ever fo much. He faid, that in place of one monarch, he was forry to observe a defign of having ten. He put the guards in remembrance of Peter the Great, who, without refpect to families, provinces, or different nations, indiferiminately advanced every one as he deferved : Wherefore he begged of the guards to go with him, and bring the Empress to her palace with honour, affuring them, that if the voluntarily should part with any share of her power, in that cafe he would make no objection. Upon this, the guards, with Tatishoff, and a very great number of nobility, went and brought the Empress to the palace, where Mr Tatifhoff was, from a lieutenant, declared privycounfellor, which is equal in rank to lieutenant-general. The great lords were banifhed at prefent, but afterwards many of them were punished with cruel deaths.

eid Twhen Perel the Oreat returned.

This Empress ruled with justice, but great feverity. If fhe at any time fhewed favour, it was chiefly to foreigners. She kept all her lifetime her Chriftian neighbours in awe and peace; and carried on a most fuccefsful war, full of glory, against the Turks. In the year 1739, fhe got her niece, the Duke of Mecklenburgh's daughter, Princefs Anne, married to Prince Erneft Ulrich of Wolfenbuttel, and declared their iffue heirs to the throne of Ruffia. At the Emprefs Anne's death, fhe declared Prince Ivan, or John, the only fon of the aforefaid Prince and Princefs, heir to the empire ; his mother his governefs till of age, and Byron, now Duke of Courland, regent, till the Emperor fhould attain his feventeenth year of age. The news of the Empress's death, and a copy of her will, were fent by a young Courland gentleman to Aftrachan, and were received with awful filence. Next day we were all obliged to go to the great church there, to be fworn before the archbishop, and sign our oaths, declaring that we were determined to fpend our lives and fortunes in defence of the late Emprefs's will, to maintain the Emperor Ivan on the throne, and the Duke of Courland regent of the empire, till the Emperor fhould attain his feventeenth year of age.

At this time, our Governor relieved a poor prifoner, who had been an enfign in the army when Peter the Great returned from his conquefts conquests in Persia. Peter gave out orders by the parole, and caufed publish them by beat of drum, that, in the night time, if any perfon walking the ftreets fhould deny to anfwer the centinel's third fummons, he had orders to fire upon him. When the orders were read to the enfign, young Pufkoff, for that was his name, faid, foolifhly enough, that if the Emperor himfelf denied to answer the third fummons, he would not hefitate to fire upon him. This was foon reported to the Emperor, who ordered him to be immured. He was accordingly put into a hole in the city wall, and the door built up with ftone and lime; neither was there any other opening into that hole, except a flit in the wall, through which he received his meat. In this hole he had remained fixteen years, and in that time had loft his underftanding; but, as he was a great enthufiaft, the populace believed him alfo to have been infpired; for when he had been fome time confined, he, not knowing a better way to get any thing to fupport nature, except what was allowed by the government, which was only very coarfe rye-flour and a little falt, pretended to predict and tell fortunes, by which means, joined to his great profession of fanctity, he lived very well. Many thousands of people ran to fee him taken out, and I went upon an oppofite wall with fome of Prince Golitzin's children, where I could have a good view, without any hazard.

zard. The foldiers first called to him to return thanks to heaven, affuring him, that Emprefs Anne was dead, and that the merciful Governor, Prince Golitzin, had given orders to reftore him to liberty upon this occasion : Then they began to break down the door, and when it was open, he was informed of it. and ordered to come out, but he returned no anfwer; whereupon a firong foldier entered into the hole, and brought him to the open air ; in doing which, Pufhkin had very near killed him with the ram-rod of a gun which he was in possession of. He stared round, and afked many queffions at the byftanders. and in particular, Whether they were not leading him to fome cruel death ? But being at last convinced that the Prince had reffored . him to his liberty, and had ordered them to carry him to the bagnio to be washed clean. and dreffed in new cloaths, which were ready for him, he, in the most fervent and fincere manner, rendered thanks to heaven, and prayed for the profperity of the merciful Governor's family. He had no fooner feen the metropolitan church, than he threw himfelf on the ground, with his head towards the church, and continued a long time rendering thanks to God for his deliverance ; then he rofe, croffed himfelf many times, and went to the bagnio, of which he had much need, for he had not the colour of a man, and it was not eafy to come near him, he fmelt fo fo difagreeably. After he had been washed. and dreffed in clean new cloaths, he had great plenty of meat given him, of which he had no great need, for Prince Golitzin ordered him, and many other prifoners, meat from his own table daily. He at last had liberty given him to go where he pleafed, and a room and bed provided for him in fome of the fervants apartments, with orders to take care of him. Every perfon expressed great fatisfaction at the release of this man, and welcomed him by giving him ftrong liquor and fpirits to drink, which foon put an end to his fufferings. Four days after he was taken out, I went into the hole, but though the door continued open. I could not draw my breath in it but with difficulty. It confifted of two apartments nearly fquare, the finalleft being eight feet by fix.

This fettlement did not continue long, for, in the month of November, we received another ucawfe or royal order, acquainting the inhabitants, that the Duke of Courland was arrefted, and fent into fome place of fafety, becaufe he had intended to ufurp the government by the most villainous means, &c. Lastly, that the Duchefs of Brunfwick, at the most humble defire of the miniflry, fenate, and all the orders of the first perfonages, and others of note in Petersburgh, had taken the reins of government into her hands, until the Emperor her fon should be of age ; and that, as fhe was declared regent of the empire by the ministry and army, it was commanded that fhe fhould be declared regent thro' the kingdom of Aftrachan, and that all ranks of people in the armies and fleet fhould give and fubscribe their oaths to be obedient and faithful to her government, and fhould, to the rifk of their lives and fortunes, by all means in their power, defend and maintain her in this high ftation, and zealoufly maintain the rights of her royal fon and family. The Princefs had, by the advice and confent of the ministry, appointed the Prince her hufband to be generalifimo of all the armies in Ruffia, and, at the fame time, had declared Count Muinich to be the first subject in Russia next the royal family, but that he was no longer to have any command in the army ; and therefore required that the army in Aflrachan should take notice of this, as no orders from him ought to be obeyed.

TRAVELS. 401

The following account of the fall of the Duke of Courland I had from people of very good reputation, and who were in St Petersburgh at the time. The Ruffians were not fatisfied that the Duke of Courland, a foreigner, and but lately a private gentleman, fhould be regent of Ruffia, and the royal family have no fhare of the government. Many, it was faid, had fpoken of this rather too freely, which was reported to the Duke, who, without lofs of time, cauled feize them, and fent them to the caftle for examination. Reprefentations in their favours from the Prince and Princels of Brunfwick were not only difregarded, but ill taken. Jealoufies, fears, and animofities ran now very high, fo that, I was affured, none of the royal family durft take an airing, for fear of the regent. Five hundred men mounted guard for the protection and honour of each of the two courts every day, and the royal family did every thing which was in their power to fecure their favour; whereas the Duke of Courland carried on affairs rather with a high hand, as he thought he was certain of keeping this power, and that the only way to do fo would be to rule with a rod of iron. It was faid, and believed by many, that he intended to cut off the royal family. and, by one way or other, to get the Princel's Elifabeth to marry his eldeft fon. Be this as it will, the Prince and Princefs of Brunfwick being in this dangerous condition, and getting ting notice that the regent had caufed torture many of their friends in the caftle, and had paffed fentence of death upon fome, who were ordered for execution in a few days, fent for the Field Marshal Count Muinich. They made him acquainted with every thing, with all the caufes of their fears, and demanded his advice and affiftance. He advifed them that they flould difclofe their apprehenfions to none, and promifed that he would foon free them of their fears or lofe his life in the attempt : Which, if he did, fhould never be a caufe of making their fituation in the fmallest degree worfe; therefore he defired that they would leave the execution of this affair to him. He had gone very privately from his own house to the palace, and took the fame precaution in returning home.

Before this time, a mifunderftanding had happened betwixt the Duke of Courland and the field marfhal; but, as the duke was now declared regent of the Empire, the field marfhal thought it could not derogate from his honour to make the first advances to a reconciliation. He therefore, without loss of time, or the smalless the first advances to a fetter to the regent professing great defire of being esteemed one of his friends, and that he would be glad to know when it would be convenient for his Highness to receive a visit.

Nothing

Nothing could poffibly have happened fo agreeable to the regent. He had not the leaft doubt of the count's fincerity, and wifhed above all things to make a man of his great abilities his friend : He therefore returned for anfwer, that he would be extremely glad to receive a vifit from the count at all times, the fooner the better; and begged that he would favour him with his company that very day at dinner; becaufe he had fome affairs of the greateft confequence to lay before him.

At dinner, (for fuch an answer the count expected, and confequently obeyed the fummons immediately) the count appeared extremely glad, and expressed much fatisfaction at the happy reconciliation. The regent, no doubt thought himfelf a happy man, in having as he imagined, a perfon of the count's abilities, his declared and open friend. The highest marks of respect and friendship were profeffed, with the greatest shew of fincerity, on both fides, and they fpent the afternoon together, taking a chearful glafs, till late in the afternoon, when they parted with mutual fatisfaction : The one that he had, as he thought, gained one of the greatest men in the Empire to be his trufty friend; the other, that he had lulled the regent into a notion of the greatest fecurity. The regent begged that the count would make his vifits very frequent, which the other affured him erecdily fhould fhould be complied with, as long as they fhould be acceptable. The regent declared nothing could ever be more agreeable to him, but little did he dream of what very foon followed.

Soon after midnight, when most people are generally afleep, except fuch as are in pain or mifery, card-players, drunkards, and villains of all kinds, the count in company of two or three trufty brave men went to the regent's palace. As he was lieutenant-colonel of the regiment of guards upon duty, and very well known to all the foldiers, he paffed on to the guard-houfe, where he demanded to fpeak with the major, who was principal commander on duty, and who, it was thought, was well acquainted with the count's defign, and fully refolved heartily to fecond him. They with a few more of the guards, whom the major could well truft, with great caution approached the bed-chamber, and foon forced open the door. It was faid that the duke with his fword for a long time defended himfelf bravely, and the dutchefs with a fabre wounding feverals, till fome rude foldiers knocked her on the head, and even after that with difficulty fecured her at laft ! Scarcely it ever happens otherways than that fomething very prodigious is related at the deaths or difgraces of great men, who have in fome fhape been eminent in the world; and fuch ftories are greedily greedily fwallowed down, and by the multitude, gain credit fooner than more probable hiftory. That the Duke of Courland, who it was well enough known did not want good judgment, should upon fuch an occasion expose himself, lady, and family to immediate certain death, when he faw himfelf furrounded by fo many brave men, may gain credit with fome children, but fcarcely with any other ; that the dutchefs might have fallen into fome outrageous fit I shall not difpute, but her fo readily getting a fabre, where none were kept, and there performing military feats, carrying down all before her, till, only by accident, fhe was knocked on the head by a rude foldier : Whilft her brother-in-law, Guftavus Biron, bred a foldier, and naturally afraid of nothing, was caught making his efcape through the garden, is too romantic for me to believe. In fhort, that they were all made prifoners and fent to Sluffelburgh, thence to Siberia, is very certain.

This event was indeed as fudden as unforefeen by the Duke of Courland: But it was most fortunate for the Royal family, and for many (fome making their numbers exceed a hundred, others confining them to forty) gentlemen, related to the principal families in Ruffia, at that time confined in the castle, for it was afferted, and probably very truly, that many were to have been brought to the torture, and fome to have fuffered death the day day following : So that it was no wonder to hear that the Ruffians rejoiced much at the downfal of the Duke of Courland. He was faid to be a man of very good parts. but rather cruel ; it was thought it was purely by his counfel that the late Empress flewed fo great difdain and cruelty to the moft ancient and noble families in Ruffia : And I cannot help thinking there are many reafons in the course of the late reign to justify the Ruffians, and others for believing this. Whoever were well with the Duke, were alfo carefied by the Empress: but it was much more dangerous for any perfon to affront one of the Duke's fervants than any of the Empress's. The Duke certainly ruled the cabinet, and by what happened in the course of this reign, it may be truly faid that affairs for the good and glory of the Empire were carried on at a high rate, but then his ambition and cruelty rendered him odious to the Ruffians: and, though no wife man would fpeak his opinion, every one, even foreigners undoubtedly condemned fuch bad conduct, which made his fall regreted by none, but his immediate dependents. Was it not the highest ambition which made him not only advise the late Empress to appoint him regent; but, contrary to all views of good policy, to maintain himfelf, which he faw he could not effect but by fwimming thro' feas of blood, in the regency ? Was it good policy policy to fet himfelf upon a level, and even threaten the Royal Family, and at the fame time, by all the ways and means which tyranny can effect, alienate the good difpofitions, and opinions of the most ignorant of all the Ruffians, by the unparalleled cruel tortures daily inflicted upon, poffibly the moft illustrious and honourable, as well as innocent and industrious people in the Empire? It fignifies very little what any defpotic court gives out against a prifoner, where perfons are examined, tried, condemned, and fuffer, not in the eyes of the world, but, most fecretly, by their enemics, who lay what ever crimes they may think fit to their charge ; or if they fuffer publicly, it is very well known that they are rendered incapable of fpeaking by gags driven into their mouths. The Duke of Courland was confcious to himfelf that he was not beloved by the Ruffians, and therefore probably wilhed for the regency, that he might have it in his power abfolutely to crush all his enemies. But it feems he did not think that torturing and putting to cruel death fo many men of different families, who only wifhed well to, and fpoke well of the Royal Family, would raife him a greater number of enemies, and that they, added to the weight of the Royal Family, might one day prove too ftrong for a ftranger and an alien ! But if he had generoufly, and of himfelf given up his regency to the Grand Duchefs, whofe natural natural right it was, then he might have lived in great fplendor and tranquillity in his dukedom of Courland, protected by the whole power of Ruffia : And probably his illuftrious family would have been in fafety at this day.

A Continuation of what happened in the Year 1740, at St Petersburgh and Astrachan.

I SHALL clofe this year with an account of what happened at St Peterfburgh and Aftrachan, in relation to the Turkifh and Perfian ambaffadors. The Turks difpatched from Conftantinople a grand embaffy, but being very late in the year, it was obliged to halt on the Turfkifh borders till the year 1741 of which I fhall fay no more till I take notice of the affairs which then happened.

I obferved that two ambaffadors had been fent by Kuli Khan this year with the elephants, one of whom died in Kizlaar. Kuli Khan however was determined to have two, therefore he difpatched another, faid to be his coufin-german; who arrived in Aftrachan with a train of five hundred men, the latter end of November. He gave out that he was to flay but a very few days and then proceed with all expedition for St Peterfburgh, and and therefore required that the governor would hold a ftrong efcort of horfemen ready to protect him and his retinue from the Kalmucks, and that the governor would grant proper paffports for his couriers to be fent to the former ambaffador, who was obliged, by the feverity of the winter, to ftop at Tamboff, a large city on the east fide of the province of Veronits : The governor answered all these requests without the smallest loss of time, and being very willing to get rid of fuch a troublefome guest at Astrachan, he let him know that it would be almost impoffible for him and his retinue to lodge in that city during the winter, becaufe magazines of provisions were laid up only for the use of the army and garrifon, and as the Kalmucks were now on the borders of Circaffia, they could not fupply him fufficiently with live cattle. The governor would not permit him to lodge in the city, being afraid, as they were very carelefs, that they might fet the city in flames, and poffibly they might do this defignedly ; as the governor was well affured by the Refident Arapoff in Perfia, that the Shach was marching his great army round the fouth end of the Cafpian Sea. through the provinces of Aftrabat, Mefanderan, Bactria, Cafbin and Ardebil, and that the vanguard was on the borders of the great Mogan defart, or Media, and that though the Shach gave out that he defigned to punifh his rebellious fubjects the Leigee Tartars, who inhabit the mountains of Caucafus, (who by the byetnever acknowledge fubjection to the Empire of Perfia) yet it was greatly to be fufpected that his principal defign was upon Circaffia, and the kingdom of Aftrachan. This, I fay, forced the governor to use all his skill to fend him into Ruffia, where he could neither be fuch an effectual fpy, nor influence the Tartar inhabitants of Aftrachan, who were all Mahome-The governor therefore gave him a tans. lodging in a large fuburb oppofite to the admiralty, which was ftrongly fortified with a number of cannon ready to be difcharged amongst them in cafe of any danger. Not contented with this, he ordered three hundred grenadiers to keep watch about him and his retinue night and day, under the command of Lieutenant-colonel Eglebright, an able, refolute officer, a Swede, who was made prifoner at the battle of Poltava. The ambaffador flormed at this treatment, threatning to make his complaint to the Shach. The governor did not regard this much, but returned polite anfwers, telling him that the colonel had been formerly well acquainted with the Perfians, and their cuftoms: and that it was to do him honour that he had appointed a man of his rank to attend his Excellency, and provide every thing neceffary for him; that the foldiers were chiefly defign-

ed to do him honour, and to take care that no fire, theft, or any other unforefeen mifchief might happen, for which he the governor might be blamed by his own court.

These answers amused him, and were not difagreeable to his pride. He had not been in Aftrachan eight days till he was taken ill of an ague ; he fent to the governor, defiring that one of the best physicians or furgeons in the city might be appointed to attend him. The governor acquainted me with this, and defired I would attend him ; but at my earneft defire, Mr Malloch, who had been formerly employed by the Perfians, and knew much more about their ways than I could do, was appointed. Mr Malloch was a very fenfible man, but had a confiderable fhare of vanity, and was follicitous to become rich : He was fo far from taking this in ill part that he returned me thanks for doing him this honour. He went, and confidering that violent medicines, fuch as emeticks might occasion fuch a vain ignorant man as the ambaffador was, to reject all medicines, and poffibly complain of him, ordered fome infusion of the bark. When this was fent to the ambaffador, he fignified to Colonel Eglebright that he would take none of it till Mr Malloch was fent for and prefent. At Mr Malloch's arrival, he went to the ambaffador with the colonel ; who required Malloch to take the first dose : This furprised him,

412 VOYAGES AND

him, who made anfwer that he was in good health, nor had need of any medicine, that he never took any medicines except when he was fick, and that if his Excellency did not chufe to take the medicines, there was no need of his attendance, and was going away, when he ordered to ftop him, and at fame time, ordered two of his men who had long poles in their hands to ftrike him, which they were preparing to do, when the colonel full of rage, his eyes flashing fire, laid his hand on his fword, and fwore that whoever ftruck Mr Malloch, fhould inftantly lofe his head. He did not fcruple even to upbraid the ambaffador, and faid that he wondered much that fuch a great Prince as the Shach was, fent as his amballador a man fo unpolite, and fo very unmannerly as to to offer to firike any officer belonging to the Empire of Ruffia, telling him at the fame time that the greateft lords in Ruffia durft not prefume to use men of his rank in that fcandalous way. Eglebright was probably as brave a man as ever eyes beheld, and was like another Hercules : His very looks difconcerted the ambaffador fo much that he begged the colonel would take no further notice of it, and faid that he hoped Mr Malloch and he would be good friends, adding that it was a cuftom in Perfia, that the phyfician fhould take the first dofe of any medicine he might preferibe for people of great great rank; to which the colonel anfwered, that no regular bred man in Europe would ever fubmit to fuch indignity; and from this he was at no lofs to know that Perfia was not fupplied with any perfons regularly educated. Thus this affair ended, much to the fatisfaction of the Governor, who never fpoke of it to the ambaffador, and Mr Malloch very foon cured him, but got only about the value of three pounds fterling for his trouble.

New year's day came on before we could get free of this beaft. There is a cuftom in Ruffia, that the drummers and muficians belonging to the army and fleet go about in a body, to pay their refpects to the great men on new year's day. The Governor ordered them to go to the ambaffador's houfe, and Colonel Eglebright to be there, I believe there were three hundred in all, or a few more. When the drums began, it was eafily observed, that the ambaffador's countenance changed, and he feemed to be in very great confusion, for he knew nothing of it before they began, and, feemingly afraid, afked the colonel the meaning of it? who, fimiling, told him it was their new-year's-day, and they meant only to do his Excellency honour ; at which he turned calm, and, when the mufick began to play, role from his fopha, and expreffed great fatisfaction ; but, though he kept the men long, he gave them only a trifle. which the colonel caufed them to return ; then then he talked of the number of the army about Aftrachan, and their late fuccefs against the Turks ? to which the colonel made pertinent anfwers, but magnified every thing greatly. On the twelfth day, the christening of the waters was performed after the manner in Ruffia, at which many Perfians mounted on horfeback attended upon a high ground immediately under a great baftion of the caftle, upon which were mounted many very great guns. When the circular fire from the fmall arms began, the Perfian horfe were put in fome confusion ; but when the great cannon were fired, they were diffracted, and vet, which is furprifing, although there were at least forty Perfians mounted, not one of them fell from their horfes. From this we could learn, that thefe horfes were not accuflomed to great guns, but that the Perfians were excellent horfemen. This ambaffador and his retinue were watched fo clofely, that they could make but few difcoveries here. The Tartars, and others of the Mahometan religion, were given to know, that it would be taken very ill if they went to him, unlefs fome Ruffian fworn interpreter was prefent, and that it would be effeemed a great crime to invite any of them to their houfes. At laft, he refolved to march from Aftrachan, and appointed a day for every thing to be got ready; but when the day came he would have again fhifted : However the colonel let him him know, that, as he had done fo frequently before, if he did not go, the Governor was determined to fend off a courier to the Ruffian refident, who would get orders to reprefent the ambaffador's unreasonable behaviour fince his arrival in Ruffia; and finally, that neither carriages nor paffage would be granted till the courier returned with an anfwer from the Shach. Upon this reprefentation, he prefently refolved to march; and orders were given to the lieutenant-colonel to pafs all the towns and cities in Aftrachan, without the ambaffador's being able to view them, and thus to hurry him through the kingdom of Aftrachan. Indeed all forts of men were glad at the departure of this troublefome man, efpecially as our markets were beginning to be very coffly to the poorer houfe-keepers.

At this time we had no fewer than four Perfian ambaffadors at once in Ruffia, viz. one on his return in Ruffia, the other on his way to St Petersburgh with the elephants, and the troublefome man I have faid fo much a-There was a fourth called Ifinael Bey, bout. who had lived in Aftrachan eighteen or twenty years : He made peace with Shach Tahmas and Peter the Great, granting to Peter, Giland, and all the provinces upon the weft fide of the Cafpian fea betwixt it and the borders of Ruffia ; but was afraid ever to return into Perfia, and therefore lived at the Ruffian expence, and kept a court like a great prince in Aftrachan.

Aftrachan. When any ambaffador from Perfia, in his way to Ruffia, halted at Aftrachan, a captain's command confifting of a hundred and twenty men kept guard upon Ifmael Bey, for two reafons : The first was, to let the Perfians fee what honour was paid him : and the other was, to prevent the Perfians from affaffinating this old man. At fuch times, no Perfian was admitted into Ifmael Bey's prefence, unlefs he gave orders to the captain. Some have been unlucky in attempting to pass the guard, without previously demanding leave from Ifmael Bey ; for no foldiers are more pointed in their duty than the Ruffians; and if the leaft force is used, the foldier, without any hefitation, will knock him down with the butt of his mulquet, or run him through with his bayonet.

THOL HOLL TOWN OF

What happened in the Year 1741.

DURING the hard froft, we were ignorant of every thing paifing in Perfia; but, as the froft feldom continues much longer than two months, that time foon elapfed, and then we were informed, that Kuli Khan had paffed the great Mogan defart, through the middle of which the rivers Arras and Cur run, and join their ftreams about fixty verfts weft west from the fea : That he had made many unfuccefsful attempts against these brave highlanders, and had loft many thousands of his best troops, an account of which I shall give when I treat of my travels through that country.

In the month of April, the heat began to grow very uneafy, and ushered in with it petechial fevers, which raged through the whole city with great fury. The Governor's children and fervants were first feized, and after that his lady. By the mercy of God they all recovered, though the Princefs was in the greateft danger, chiefly owing to her being delirious, and not eafily managed by her fervants, nor indeed by me, as I could not take the liberty to use all freedom with a lady of her diffinguished family and rank in the world. At the beginning of this difeafe, I advited the good old Prince not to enter the rooms where the fick children lay, nor eat much animal food, nor fleep with any perfon with him, but to drink with acids, and every morning and evening to take a little exercife by walking upon the walls of the caftle ; but above all, to take care that the non-naturals be kept perfectly regular. He followed my advice, and efcaped. His lady had a dangerous relapfe, from which the was recovered by a very great diaphurefis. Three days before this happened, the was quite delirious, when I expressed my very great concern for her fafe-

ty,

ty, at which the Prince was very melancholy; but there was a necessity for my discovering that I apprehended danger, becaufe it was fo ordered by an imperial decree, that all the ceremonies, according to the Greek church, might be duly performed : But had not that been the cafe, I was fo much caft down from the fear of her danger, that any, who knew me, might have eafily known the caufe ; for my own mother never could have been more careful of me than fhe was. She had not been long fweating, when fhe was overtaken with a calm pleafant fleep. I then attended clofely, and, after the had flept fourteen hours, The lifted up her eyes, and fpoke to me quite fenfibly. I then left her with her waitingwoman, and, with joy, told the Prince of my good hopes, who could not be kept from feeing her; but he flaid no time, as I affured him, that, unless the had more fleep, the would probably fuffer a fecond relapfe. This being the last time that any of that illustrious family were fick during my flay in Aftrachan. I fhall trouble the reader no further about their difeafes, but proceed.

The Princess of the Kalmucks arrived upon the banks of the Volga fooner than was expected, and passed the river with her children and the bulk of the warlike Kalmucks, before the Ruffians and Cossac could arrive on the banks of the Volga, where the remained during the fummer. It was believed, that this Princefs was advised to take this ftep, to prevent being forced to yield up the principality to the above-mentioned Donduck Dafhee, who, fhe was informed, was on his journey for that purpole, and had fet out from Cazan, where I shall just now leave him Had this Princefs remained on the weft fide of the Volga, fhe was afraid that the weftern banks of the Volga, the Don Coffacks upon the river Don, and the Circaflians. and Grebenske Coffacks on the fouth, might altogether either have forced her to quit all titles to her principality, or might have gained over many of the Kalmuck chiefs either through deceitful promifes or fear ; or laftly, that all these powers combined at once againft her, might have cramped her principality very much, and at laft, probably, force her to feek protection from the Turks, which fhe had already experienced in her hufband's lifetime to be very uncomfortable ; and therefore it was faid, that fhe had ftolen a march upon the Ruffian troops, and very early paffed the Volga; that, in cafe the empire fhould use violent means, fhe might at least have the chance of a vaft extended defart, where fhe, with her faithful Kalmucks, might take refuge, and have a probability of joining with the great nation, called Black Kalmucks, whole religion, manners, and cuftoms, are the fame with her's and the Chinefe. What, ever her reafons were, I cannot positively af_ fert.

fert, but that she passed the Volga, with thirty or forty thousand men, is certain.

The next affair that happened worth taking notice of, is the arrival of the Perfian ambaffador from St Peterfburgh, who was obliged to winter in Ruffia in his way to Perfia.

The governor having experienced the danger of letting thefe Perfians lodge near the city. obliged this ambaffador to flay in an old palace, which Peter the Great had built for himfelf, diftant about one mile from Aftrachan, on a branch of the river Volga. He alfo commanded three hundred foldiers to encamp about the palace, under pretence of doing honour to, and protecting the embaffy; but truly to fpy their actions and take particular notice of the inhabitants of Aftrachan who might pay him vifits, which was forbidden : For by this time the Shach had marched to the north of Derbent, and we had very great reafon to fear, that, whatever excules he made, or pretences to punish his rebellious Lefgees, his real defign was to fall upon Affrachan. But the Governor had more certain reafons to be afraid of this, than the inhabitants of Aftrachan were acquainted with, of which he gave me the following account, when I went with him into Perfia.

As the Governor had been warned by many trufty men from Buchara and Chiva, he was as much on his guard as was poffible. He alfo not only, under divers pretences, fent fent fpics into Perfia, but alfo into Buchara and Chiva. He, from all thefe inftruments, learned certainly, that the Shach had fcarcely reached Mezenderan, when he was informed, that the inhabitants of Chiva had unexpectedly fallen upon the Perfian troops he had left to keep them under his government, and had cut them all to pieces, except a very few ftragglers, who had brought thefe news; whereupon the Chivines loft no time in difpatching ambaffadors to St Peterfburgh to declare this happy event for them, to warn the Ruffians to put no truft in the perfidious Perfian promifes ; and laftly, to feek the protection of the empire against Kuli Khan. As thefe ambaffadors were obliged to pafs thro' Aftrachan, they difcovered all to the Governor, who careffed them much, and fent them carefully and expeditioufly forward to St Peterfburgh. At the fame time, the friendship he cultivated with the Chivines, was only perfonal, never engaging for the honour of the empire. Add to this, that many of the Georgians and Lefgee Tartars were often coming to Aftrachan, giving an account of what the Shach had done, and the places of his encampment; all agreeing that he certainly defigned, if nothing flopped him, to fall upon the borders of Ruffia, notwithstanding the great professions of amity and respect he pretended to have for the Ruffian empire.

bin chievel Loo About

About this time Perfian coin, both gold and filver, was brought to the Tartar markets, and alfo into the city in great plenty. The governor having been informed of this, caufed feize the Kahnucks, who brought it in; and upon examination they declared, that they had that money from Perfian and Tartar fpies, a number of whom were fent amongft them, and fome were alfo in Aftrachan.

With fuch privacy and precaution were thefe fpies picked up, and fent to Oranburgh, and other places of fecurity, that I, who lived in the governor's houfe, and daily eat at his table, never learned any thing of it, till five years after this the Prince informed me, when we were marching into Perfia; and the method he took to keep every thing fecret was thus.

He caufed bring the prifoners, found in and about the city, into the citadel, and lodge them in a ftrong fecure place, into which he went, attended only by his counfellors and fecretaries, who were fworn not to divulge what paffed there, or fpeak about thefe prifoners to any perfon. After due examination, and when there was a number of them together, they were chained and fent with their proper guard, out of the city in the night time to Oranburgh. He ordered alfo a number of foldiers, armed with piftols and broad fwords hid under their garments, and and cloathed like Ruffian peafants, to go, as if to traffic, amongft the Kalmueks, and pick up all fufpicious perfons, but ftrictly ordered them to obferve the utmost fecrecy. In this manner did this wife governor pick up the greatest number of those spices, that the Shach was quite at a loss how to proceed.

He had threatened the Turks, it is true, and at this time it was rumoured that he had actually laid fiege to Kars, and other cities belonging to the Turks : But we were very well affured of the contrary : For he was encamped with his army about thirty miles north from Derbent, fighting with Ufinci a Lefgee prince, and had built a large caftle under the hills, which I have feen, to protect his army from the inroads of thefe brave highlanders; a diffinct account of which I fhall give when treating of thefe countries.

In fhort, the couriers difpatched by land, by the way of Kizlaar, from the Perfian ambaffadors to their Shach, were way-laid, feized and fent to Siberia, as were alfo the couriers difpatched from him to them, whole writings fell into the hands of the Governor, which effectually difcovered that he intended to fall upon the kingdom of Aftrachan.

At laft it was found out, that the Perfian couriers were loft, whereon a complaint was made to the court of St Peterfburgh, and alfo to the government of Aftrachan. The Governor iffued out his fham orders ders to fcour the defarts, to take better care in time coming, and to examine all fufpected perfons, and many innocent people at this time were feized, but fuffered no manner of hurt, only a fhort confinement, but very good treatment otherways, purely with a defign to amufe, and fatisfy the Perfians.

Left the unwary foldiers employed in thefe fecret affairs, fhould acquaint their companions of what they had been doing, express informations were fent to the governors, to whole care they were fent, to retain them there, and fend an equal number of their foldiers to Aftrachan. By this means thefe fecret transactions never were known to the inhabitants of Aftrachan : Nor could I ever have come to the knowledge of them if I had not been informed by the Prince himfelf five years thereafter, as I faid above.

I thought it interefting to know what became of thefe prifoners who were fent to Oranburgh and other parts, and begged that the Prince would inform me whether they were not put to death : He affured me that they were only kept as prifoners at large, that is to fay, they had liberty to go about and follow any bufinefs they could, but were not permitted to go out of the confines preferibed to them ; and that all of them expreffed very great faisfaction at their fortune, in being refcued from fo much trouble and danger as they were daily exposed to by their tyrant, and and that many of them had profeffed the Chriftian religion, were married, and enjoyed all the immunities which natural-born Ruffians enjoy.

But to return to the ambaffador, who was getting ready to fet out on his return from Aftrachan to Perfia: About the end of May, he was informed that two fhips were ready to transport him and his retinue to Persia; and the Governor defired that he would make all hafte to depart, as much time had already been loft, and that the veffels would fail in a few days, whether he went or not ; but advertifed him, that if he did not accept of that good opportunity of a free paffage, he might go in what manner he pleafed on his own charges; and that the court of Ruffia had fent orders to withdraw his daily allowance of provision, if he flaid longer than the time prefcribed. Accordingly the ambaffador in earneft made all hafte, and bought up many things which were, by the Ruffians, judged contraband, and alfo had imprudently ftolen two Ruffian boys from poor people. The parents having acquainted the Governor of their reafons for fuspecting that the Persians had stolen their children, he fent a friendly meffage to the ambaffador, letting him know, that he could permit no contraband merchandife to be fhipped off for Perfia, and defiring him inftantly to return fuch goods to the merchants, and receive back his money. He alfo acquainted him, him, that two boys were loft, and the parents had but too good reafon to fufpect that fome of his train had ftolen them; therefore defired that they might be reftored without further trouble to their parents. This civil remonfirance was neither kindly taken, nor in any part complied with ; wherefore the ambaffador received a fecond meffage, acquainting him, that the Governor intended to pay him a visit that afternoon, and explain matters to him. The Governor was told, that the ambaffador raged at his meffage in a very threatening, ill-bred manner ; wherefore he caufed a few troops to march, and remain near the old palace, and, with a retinue of gentlemen. rowed down the river in his barge. At their first meeting, the Perfian was very ill-bred and high, but a chair being placed for the Governor, after his fury was a little abated, he very calmly told him, that he was furprifed that any perion, who represented his fovereign, could put himfelf in fuch puerile paffion about what could not be helped ; that he might eafily think no government would have their laws trampled upon and defpifed by any. He faid, for I was prefent and heard the whole difcourfe, that no ambaffador ever pretended to privileges which were repugnant to the well-being or laws of the empire to which he was fent : but that, when he had taken his last audience of leave to return to his native country from the late Empress, his embaffy embaffy ended; nor could any perfon in their fenfes imagine, that he then had properly the privileges of ambaffadors, though it was true that the Ruffians, fo long as they behaved well, paid great refpect to those who had been in that high flation; yet his embaffy being ended, he was no ambaffador. But he obferved, with a determined countenance, that all these his transactions, fince he came to Aftrachan, would be honefly reported to the Shach; and laftly, that he was refolved, that no provisions, nor other marks of refpect or beneficence fhould be granted to him and his retinue, till the children were reftored, and that he had already given orders to the commanders of the fhips, to receive no forbidden merchandife; and having faid this, he took his leave. He had fcarcely gone to the river fide, when the boys were reftored, and this troublefome Perfian was at laft obliged to give up all his merchandife. Concerning the Author's Journey to St Petersburgh; what happened remarkable on the road, at St Petersburgh, and till his return.

T Had now remained eighteen months in Afrachan, without having received my falary, or any other appointment. Before I left St Peterfburgh, I had contracted a great kindnefs for Mils Hadderling, whole father was fuperintendant over all the floop-builders, and captain in the Ruffian fervice; her mother was daughter to Mr Edwards, captain of one of the Ruffian men of war, both English. Some overtures about our marriage having been agreed to, I defired greatly to go to St Petersburgh, and, for excufe, reprefented effectually my not having been properly appointed to any command, nor having received my falary to fubfil upon. My greatest difficulty was to get permiffion from the Governor; but, after many fruitless attempts, I at laft fucceeded, by promifing to return to him, even if I should take my discharge from the fervice; to do which, I thought my right could not be opposed, though in this I was miftaken, as I afterwards experienced.

Before I enter upon my journey, I muft beg to be indulged in relating what happened

ed to my wife when the was an infant. Her parents had made a finall fortune, and, tired of the Ruffian fervice, agreed to return to England, to live in Woolwich among their relations : In order to effect this with the greater fafety, they agreed that Mrs Hadderling fhould go with her infant and all their valuable effects to an uncle fhe had, named Edwards, an eminent filk-weaver, who lived in London. She accordingly failed from Cronftadt in a British ship, in the year 1722, with great prosperity and favourable winds, till they were oppofite Yarmouth, when the fhip began to fill with water ; though the weather was not very ftormy, nor could the pumps relieve them: In this diffrefs, they took to the long-boat, into which they hurried Mrs Hadderling, and a humane failor took care of the infant ; but the ship funk quickly, which obliged the failor to tofs the child into the long-boat, which was preferved by falling upon fomething foft. By this misfortune Mrs Hadderling loft all her effects ; and, it was faid, that the captain had villainoufly funk the fhip. Be this as it will, Mrs Hadderling next day arrived in London, and waited upon her uncle, who kept them that winter; and, as he had no children, would gladly have kept his niece, promifing to give her, at his death, all the fortune he might be worth : But her father would not fubmit to this, and her good uncle, the is afraid, is dead, as the has heard nothing nothing of him fince fhe has been married. Having, as was faid, obtained leave, and received the neceffary paffport, I fet out in a post-boat, accompanied, by the goodnets of our Governor, with a grenadier, who formerly had been frequently fent courier to St Peterfburgh. and knew the road very well. We proceeded about two hundred miles from Aftrachan. by rowing and failing, without meeting with any thing uncommon : At this diftance it blew a ftrong gale from the north, fo that, having both the current of the river and an exceeding bold wind to fight against, and the men being unable to do more, we drew the boat into a fmall creek in an ifland, refolving to wait till the wind was abated. The men being very much fatigued, and wet with the fplashing of the water, for we had no rain. went alhore, and laid themfelves down to fleep, whilft I watched, for my thoughts had banifhed fleep from me. In this creek we had not been long, till I fpied a boat coming down the river with reefed fail. I wakened the men, who faid that it was a post-boat, and that their orders were, never to pais one another, when there was a poffibility of changing ; wherefore they made a fignal, which effectually brought the other boat to. They were convoying a Kalmuck to the Governor of Aftrachan. This man feemed to be in diftrefs, was very well dreffed, had only a battle-ax, but neither bow, arrows, nor feymitar. Understanding he could speak Ruffian language, 1 enquired if there were any news in the country, and from whence he came? Upon this he burft out in a flood of tears, but, having composed himself, gave me the following account by one of the boatmen who underftood him : I am flying for my life to the protection of the Governor of Aftrachan. This day has been a fatal day to my Prince, and I am afraid, that out of five thousand brave Kalmucks, I am the only one referved to lament the lofs of the much beloved, brave Prince of the Kalmucks, who, upon the moff explicit affurances given him by the Court of Ruffia, that the Princefs, wife of the late Donduk Ambo, would diveft herfelf and her children of any pretensions they might have to reign over the Kalmucks, in his favour, marched from Cazan, where he had lived fome years in a princely manner, to the place where the widow Princefs kept her court, (not twenty miles diffant from where we then were, on the east fide of the Volga.) He, after a week's march, arrived within three or four verfts of the Princels, accompanied with five thoufand brave men, to her fore-poft or outguards, dreading no harm ; there he was advifed to ftop by them, becaufe, they faid, they had orders to permit no armed men to advance nearer the camp where fhe was, and begged that he would not rashly expose his men or them to unneceffary danger ; but at the fame time told him, that they would receive any meffage from him to the Princefs, deliver the fame, and bring an anfwer, or that they would permit any one of his followers, unarmed, to carry a meffage to the Princefs, and receive what anfwer fhe might be difpofed to grant.

This being agreed to, the Prince withdrew his followers to a fmall diftance, and fent one, in whom he could confide to the Princefs, with instructions to inform her Highness of the great refpect he entertained for her and her children ; that he hoped he never fhould have reason to change his fentiments; and let her know, that he was arrived there with a few faithful friends, by the affurances the Court of Ruffia had given him, that her Highnefs would have no objections that he fhould take on him, which he faid was his right, the government of the Kalmucks ; that her Hignefs's, out-guards would not permit him to advance nearer till her pleafure was known, and he had withdrawn to a finall diftance, where he intended to wait her friendly anfwer.

The only answer the was pleafed to return, was, that it was now late, but that next morning the would foon adjust all their affairs. He faid the Prince did not relish fuch an answer, but was determined to wait the event.

Accordingly next morning, with the rifing of the fun, the Princei's appeared, mounted on horfeback, with about thirty thoufand armed men at her back, and, without the finalleft ceremony, gave orders for an attack, which, he believed, bloody on both fides : At this he cried like a child, faying, that without doubt his Prince was killed, and that he had no reafon to believe that any were faved but himfelf, who miraculoufly fled, he thought, unperceived in the thick duft, to the Ruffian refident, who was encamped with about three hundred foldiers on a rifing ground, at no great diftance from the field of battle.

The refident was a captain : Whether it would have been thought prudent in him to interfere or not, I fhall not take on me to determine. He never, fo far as I know, was queftioned for looking on as an impotent fpectator : But fure he might have used all his arguments to diffuade the Princes from fpilling fo much innocent blood, which I never heard he had attempted.

The refident however got this man conveyed privately to the river fide, where he had boats for the ufe of his men; from thence he difpatched him poft with a pacquet, which he fhowed me, for the Governor. I requefted him to eat a little of what I had, but he faid he could not; however, I got him perfuaded to take a glafs of wine and a bit of bread, and thus we parted. I imagined that I was long enough in company, and in the neighbourhood of thefe barbarians: As my 3 I men men were not fatigued, after giving each of them a glafs of fpirits, I perfuad d them to proceed, which they did with difficulty and danger. We gained their pofthouse in the evening, and passed the Kalmuck's camp in the night-time, and met with nothing remarkable till we arrived at Tzaritzin.

At this city I hoped to get a travelling waggon, but no fach vehicle was to be puichafed. I was obliged to fet out on a cart with four wheels, for which I paid a ruble and a little fpirits. We were fent with difpatches to the cabinet, and therefore were obliged to make all expedition. It is true, that I had two paffports, one for myfelf, and the other for the grenadier, in cafe I might happen to fall fick, or, by any unforeseen cause, be hindered from prosecuting my journey with fuch expedition as was required. In fuch a conjuncture, I would have been obliged to fend off the grenadier with the difpatches, which I had no inclination to do; becaufe the foldier was of great use in procuring horses, and whatever I wanted. From Aftrachan I arrived in Tzaritzin in fix days by water, and from Tzaritzin I arrived in Molcow in nine days in my cart, without meeting with any other accident than burning four axletrees, and breaking twelve cart-wheels. Thus I was carried by water against the stream, and frequently against the wind, five hundred and twelve twelve verfts in fix days, and from Tzaritzin to Molcow one thousand and fifty one verfts in nine days. I, being extremely fatigued, and all over bruifed with the cart, fent my foldier to buy a waggon with proper harneffes ; and, thus equipped, fet out and arrived in St Petersburgh in little more than three days, though I met with fome hindrance on the road. I fhall not mention the more remarkable towns I paffed by and through at this time; because I was too much fatigued, and in too great hafte to make any observations ; I shall refer that till my return with my wife, and shall only take notice of two or three accidents, though trifling, which I met with betwixt Tzaritzin and St Petersburgh.

At Tzaritzin I bought up as much provifion as I thought would be neeedful for the foldier and me, till we fhould arrive at Chopra caftle, where we might have been fupplied with more. We marched, without any uncommon accident happening, till we arrived at a poft-houfe within a mile of Michaelofka. (N. B. Thofe who go by poft feldom touch at any town till they arrive at Tamboff. Pofthoufes are built in the defart in order that the courier may have the florteft way) where, by accident, I happened to prefent to the writer the foldier's paffport in place of my own: At this the writer made fome foruple, faying it was very uncommon to have two paffports : But as we were difpatched to the Senate he durft not offer to ftop us; because it is no less than death to ftop fuch couriers. He however drove the cart to Chopra, but arriving there late, the writer belonging to that place had gone to bed in the town; of which I was glad, bccaufe I might have been unneceffarily hindered all night : The writer who brought us there, made what haste he could to confult with the other writer : But I ordered in the mean time to yoke in the fresh horses and drive away. In paffing between the town and caftle, we met both the writers, fo very expeditious had they been, who would have ftopped us; but the foldier, who was a terror amongft these people, fwore that he would instantly shoot any who durst attempt to stop us, as we were travelling in the night-time, and couriers for the cabinet, and that if the post-boy deferted us, that he would fire at him and drive on himfelf: Thus we efcaped being flopped a whole night at leaft, and I was afraid that if they had been examined, it might have been found irregular in the governor of Aftrachan to have granted two paffports in this manner; though neither the government nor post-houses fuffered by them any lofs. I was afterwards however informed that the governor had done nothing irregular: But the Coffacks, whole towns thefe two were, having more liberty than the Ruffians.

fians, frequently make great work about nothing. Betwixt Chopra and Tamboff is a great defart of one hundred and eighty verfts in which I had but fmall chance of getting any provision, and the foldier being a ftrong young healthy fellow who cat plentifully, we, having eat every bit of our own provifions, were reduced to the greatest necessity. In this extretremity we arrived at a pofthoufe in a very hot fultry day, near the middle of this defart, where we joyfully observed a kettle boiling; the people told us that they were making a foup of pork, and fome barley and greens; that we fhould be welcome to a little of it; but, they having no other veffels to cool it in, than a trough in which they used to feed fome pigs, we would be obliged to wait till it was cool enough in the pot, which was the only veffel they cat out of. (These people only stay for a fortnight or month, and are changed by others, fo that they bring no furniture of any kind but what they find abfolutelely neceffary.) We durft make no ftay; hunger is extremely pinching; the foldier made not the leaft hefitation to wafh as clean as he could the nafty veffel, and having cooled fome broth, he defired to know whether I would tafte it? At any other time fuch a mefs thus ferved up would have proved emetic, but at this time hunger forced me to tafte it, which feeming very delicious, I eat greedily. The pork was truly truly good, which, with rye bread, was one of the beft meals I ever made in my life, upon the ftrength of which we arrived at Tamboff, where we were plentifully fupplied.

Farther on betwixt Tamboff and Rezen, notwithstanding all the care we had the hindermoft axletree burnt, and our carriage broke down in the middle of a finall defart. We had a fpare axletree, but it was too large. nor had we an ax; at a diffance we faw fome peafants mowing hay, to whom the foldier went for an ax, but returned without fuccefs. Extremely mortified at this accident, I was going to difpatch the foldier with the exprefs for the cabinet on foot to the next posthouse, when he, who did not chuse to part with me, made anfwer, that if I would buy him a broad-fword, if he happened to break his, he would foon make the axletrce to answer: To this proposal I gladly agreed. and indeed very expeditioufly he made the axletree fit for the carriage. After this, I never travelled without an ax. On the north fide of Molcow I was neceffitated to visit a relation of our governor's, who kept me to fupper about two hours. As his houfe was a mile from the post road, the post-boy. at the next village on the right road, faid, that his horfes, had no refreshment at the last village and defired an hour to feed them, which was readily granted. I fell on a fleep, as did the foldier, but din 1 when when I looked up, the fun was high in the firmament, and the post-boy with his two horfes were gone. In the village we found only one man and two horfes, who agreed to carry us about fix verits farther to the next post-house. If a regular complaint had been made of him who left us, he would have fuffered death; but, I thank God, my hands are hitherto free from blood.

My grenadier had hitherto behaved with undaunted courage, and though I had frequently reproved him for mal-treating the poftmen for not making the expedition he directed, though impoffible for their horfes to do more, he would not abfolutely defift, but, with an air of important diligence, would order them to drive on ; and, though often reproved, did not feldom refresh their memories with his whip. At laft, to the north of Tweer, he threatened a very furly fellow, and, receiving very difagreeable returns, foon made him experience the elafticity of his whip. The driver, not relifting fuch difcipline, leapt from the waggon, and in an inftant overturned my grenadier, dexteroufly belabouring him, till I was truly afraid he would have killed him. With all my power, joined to that of the grenadier, I could fcarcely get him difengaged from the grenadier's hair, who by this time was heartily frightened, his face being all covered with blood, and much hair torn from his head. After this my grenadier 10 was was metamorphofed from a very troublefome quarrelfome fellow, to the gentlenefs of a lamb, nor durft he use his ftrength and former inclination when there was need for it. At the next village, however, though I was not difpleafed that the foldier had got a check, I complained to the post-overfeers. and put them in mind of the danger they were in to let a crime of that kind go unpunifhed. I did not forget to affure the guilty man, that my doing fo was with a view to fave him from the gallows, of which he would have been certain, if I had complained to the cabinet. His fuperiors, as the grenadier, who gladly witneffed the execution, told me, punifhed him feverely till his back was covered over with blood.

We had travelled within a few verfts of Novogorod, when we fpied many couriers from the cabinet, all officers; but as they were exerting all their faculties, trying who fhould get firft, we could have no intelligence from them. We had not proceeded much farther, when we were met by one leading his horfe quite fatigued, who would have preffed our horfes, being a cabinet-courier; but when he underftood that we were carrying meffages to the cabinet, he defifted; for cabinet couriers have power to prefs any horfes, when theirs are fatigued, and rendered unable to proceed. He however informed us, that the Grand Duchefs was delivered

of a daughter, and those officers who had paffed us were sent to the different provinces, to intimate these joyful news. After this I met with nothing remarkable until I arrived at St Petersburgh, which I did with all fafety on the 18th of July, and took up my lodging in a palace belonging to my benefactor and commander, Prince Golitzin.

Concerning what happened in St Petersburgh.

TT is remarkable that none of my old acquaintances knew me : I was unknown even to my own brother. As I thought it reafonable to take this day to myfelf, I fent for him, and then, in company with him, went to Mr Hadderling's houfe. We found him at home in company with Brigadier Crofts, my wife's uncle, but neither of them knew me. I enquired for Mr Hadderling's daughters, and was informed that they were taking a walk, but would return about tea-time, which they did, but they also did not know me; indeed I was as brown as a Spaniard. having been conftantly exposed to the weather eighteen days. Next day I went to the medicine-chancery, at the regular hours, and was immediately introduced to the archiator, who happened to be there with my worthy 3 K friend VAS friend Dr Miniatty, of whom I made mention formerly. The archiator expressed fome furprife and refentment at my arrival, without having asked leave from the chancery ; but when I had fatisfied him that I had hitherto never been appointed by the admiralty, nor had received my falary fince I left Taverhoff. and produced my paffport from the Prince, with a letter for him, he was fatisfied, and affured me, that he had fent four memorials to the admiralty to enforce my fettlement and falary, and that I should carry the fifth next day. I returned him my refpectful thanks, but begged that he would either grant my difcharge, or increafe my falary five crowns more per month, as Mr Malloch had received the fame; and as I was intrufted with the affairs which he had been intrufted with, that I would prefently petition the chancery for that purpose. The archiator answered, that I had not ferved long, and that fuch an advancement of falary was granted only to old fervants. I infifted however, that I had done my duty, and now, as I was born free, I-would either have what was but reafonable. or my difcharge. Dr Miniatty, who had been filent all this time, faid many obliging things in my favour, and defired to fpeak with the archiator privately. The refult was, that he ordered me to prepare a petition for the advancement of my falary, which he had determined to grant, 'ut discharged me to mention any thing about my discharge. Before I left the chancery, I got my petition ready, and delivered it into the archiator's hand.

Next morning I attended the chancery, and received my dilpatches according to my defire for the admiralty. At this time, being well able to fpeak, read, and write the Ruffian language, I had no need of an interpreter, and, afraid of falling into the bafe Secretary Neleuboff's hand, I, though I had no acquaintance with him, went refolutely to Admiral Golovine, a profeffed friend to the Britifh upon all occasions, and prefident of the admiralty. The grandees do not keep people long in waiting, as is done in more civilized nations. I was immediately admitted, and, after I had told him all my grievances, I offered to put into his hands the memorials from the chancery ; but he faid that I ought to carry them to the admiralty, and prefent them myfelf to the board, with a petition acquainting them, that I had been near nineteen months kept from duty by the admiralty's not having duly anfwered the memorials from the medicine-chancery, and craving that the board would do me juffice, and difpatch me for Aftrachan with all convenient fpeed. I did fo, and next morning attended the board when the prefident was there, and produced my memorials and petition, which occafioned a very great commotion among the writers. Neleuboff was fent for, and inftantly put under arreft, as was his conciliarift. This laft is a perfon whofe bufinefs it is to keep all the writers belonging to the department in good order, and alfo to get all difpatches ready, according to orders he receives from the fecretary; but fometimes, as in the prefent cafe, they confound all regularity, and when detected, feldom efcape deferved punifhment.

The fecretary, by fome fubterfuge, had the good fortune to get free with a threatening reprimand; but the poor conciliarift was condemned to die. I was told that application was made to the moft merciful regent the Grand Duchefs to fave his life, and appoint him to run the gauntlet, which he could but have performed aukwardly enough, as he had formerly loft a leg. This punifhment he had the good fortune to efcape, by the Princefs Elifabeth's mounting her father's throne a few days before he ought to have fuffered.

I loft no time, as has been related, to put my affairs on a good footing; but there I let them remain a while. As I had fome defire to ftay, after fo long abfence, amongft my friends; and, as I had nothing to do but attend the admiralty once every day, only to let them fee I was in the way of my duty and ready, I had the more time to make my obfervations. Befides European ambaffadors, one from China, one from Conftantinople, and two from Perfia, refided at once in St Peterfburgh, terfburgh, and many from finaller Afiatick principalities. The Chinefe ambaffador was much efteemed for his moderation and good quiet behaviour. The Turkish was infolent, as was his numerous retinue, beyond all defcription. Some of his followers, having tranfgreffed the bounds of all difcretion, not fatisfied with affronting people on the ftreets, through which they frequently used to ride, purely for mischief, at last entered into the inhabitants houfes by force, and attempted to abufe both married and unmarried women. Complaints having been fent from the miniftry to the ambaffador, were unanfwered and difregarded : At laft a memorial was put into his hands acquainting him of the many former reprefentations which had been fent to him, reprefenting the mifconduct of his followers, without any regard having been paid to them ; that this was the laft they intended to fend, in which the ministry demanded, that the Turks fhould only be allowed to walk, unarmed, into the city; and that their number never should exceed two or three at a time ; that the centinels had orders to put a ftop to a greater number ; and laftly, that an express was fent to the Sublime Porte to juffify fuch conduct. This memorial, inftead of reftraining, rather inflamed them; for foon after they received it, five Turks fuperbly dreffed, mounted upon their best horses, dared to ride up to the bridge, where where a ferjeant's command did duty, which they attempted to pafs, though the foldier upon watch gave them a fign to retire. The foremost of the Turks, at one blow, cut off an arm of the foldier with his fcymitar. The ferieant at the head of the foldiers brought the Turk to the ground with his halbert, and killed another outright, then ordered the foldiers to prefent; but the three remaining Turks had no inclination to continue longer. It was faid that the Turk who fell from his horfe was in great danger of his life. Threatening complaints were fent to the Grand Chancellor Count Ofterman, who, I doubt not, anfwered them properly; but in place. (as was demanded by the ambaffador) of punishing the ferjeant, he was immediately advanced, for his gallant behaviour, to the rank of an enfign, becaufe be had exactly obeyed the orders given him.

I there faw the public entry of the Perfian ambaffador, and the prefents, with the elephants I formerly had feen at Aftrachan, which was fuperb enough. The ambaffador, with fome of his principal attendants, was carried to court in coaches belonging to the Emperor. Soon after that, many Perfians advanced with Chinefe boxes, in which, it was faid, were contained valuable curiofities natural and artificial, and fome jewels of all kinds. What the value of thefe prefents might be, I never was informed. After they were were gone, the elephants were conducted, every one directed by a man fitting behind his cars, with a finall ax in his hand, fuch as I defcribed formerly. The unruly elephant was very troublefome, for I was witnefs to his flying into a fit of paffion, that required all the art and power of his keeper to command him. I happened to be flanding with the learned and reverend Mr Lerna, our minister, within the glacis of the admiralty, when the beaft, unprovoked, reared his trunk high, made a noife, and directed his fleps towards us. We very foon retreated, but if his rider had not been able to manage him, he might have undoubtedly killed fome hundreds of people. Thefe great beafts were covered with very rich filks, brocades, and cloth of gold, fome of them reached near the ground. They gave out that King Solomon's tent covered one of them. It was of filk, very large, antient, and certainly the worfe of the wearing; but I fcarcely believe it was Solomon's. This however was effected a precious prefent.

After I left St Peterfburgh, in the reign of the Empress Elliabeth, in the winter scafed, I was informed, that the courtiers caused two of the largest elephants to be brought before the winter palace, with a design to make them fight; for which purpose a large dyke of fnow was made cross the great area before the palace. They brought an elephant on each fide of this this dyke, opposite the one to the other, fpoke to them, encouraged, and provoked them as much as they could, but all to no purpofe. They feemed to rejoice to meet, and played with their long teeth as oxen are wont to do with their horns, but never offered the finalleft violence. The foldiers had at laft orders to throw fquibs and fmall fire-works among their feet. The elephant is extremely afraid of all kinds of fire-works : It was cherefore thought, that this would have the effect of caufing them fight; but in this they were alfo miftaken. It had indeed the effect of frightening them exceffively; and they ran with their directors differently; the one ran under a large arch, and there killed his governor. by fqueezing him betwixt the arch and his back ; the other ran up the principal freet, and in his fright feized a German baker, toffed him high up in the air, and when the unfortunate man fell down upon the ftreet, the elephant at once preffed him with his foot to a math.

I faw yet remaining betwixt the palace and the admiralty part of the ice houfe, which the late Empress Anne had caused build with a view to ridicule one of the most antient and respectable families in Russia, by causing marry one of that family difordered in mind, to a woman troubled with the fame infirmity. Few great personages have ever appeared in the world, who have not one time or other difcovered discovered some weakness, which could fcarcely have been fufpected, till detected. The Empress Anne was faid to have been a fenfible, humane, judicious lady, but the could not check her childifh levities ; and it is not easy to imagine what was her policy or pleafure in this improper difplay of her power. The walls were of ice; the bed-ftead, and all pieces of household furniture were made of ice; they fired out of ice cannons : But for what? to do honour, or, which is the truth, to ridicule the Rufs nobility in the perfon of a poor foolifh pair, taken from the beft family in Ruffia. The fame fum of money, which was expended upon this dream, might have made many honeft good families in Ruffia very happy. I could not help thinking, that it looked as if heaven had defigned to let us fee, what a poor end the greateft earthly grandeur frequently comes to; for no fooner was this farce of mock magnificence ended, than that great Empress was taken ill and died; and although the fucceeding fummer was extremely hot, yet part of the walls of that ice-house flood, to expose the last action of the great Empreis Anne, till the month of August, as it were to let people, living at the diffance of thoufands of miles, have time to witness the last whim of one of the greatest perfonages upon earth, to have been only fit to amufe children. a und disco

In the month of August we had daily news of the Swedes defigning to attempt the defirmction of the royal navy at Cronftadt. One day in the admiralty, I happened to fpeak with an Englishman, who had been very long in the fervice, and was employed at Revel. He was expressly fent for to go to Cronfladt, to fink fome veffels to prevent any accels by the Swedes near the harbour. He faid that he had effectually done his duty, and that the board had given him the rank of captain of foot; but observed, that if they had advanced his falary, and given him a finall pecuniary confideration, it would have been more agreeable to him. This man was brought into Ruffia by the father of his country, the Great Peter : he was faid to be a very eminent mechanic, and underflood fea-affairs extremely well, and altho' he was grown old in the fervice, he was but at that time titled a captain, without any increase of his falary for that work I mentioned : No lefs than the fafety of Cronftadt depended upon it, though there was not found one belonging to the navy that the board of admiralty could trust with it; and the only impediment to make a figure in the navy was owing to an exceffive modefty, and a confiderable fhare of wildom, uleful to others, but not to himfelf.

The great General Keith arrived in St Peterfburgh this feafon. I would gladly give a character of this great man, but finding myfelf myfelf very unequal to fuch a performance, let it therefore fuffice to fay, if ever any man was poffeffed with wildom, true bravery. and greatness of foul, he was the perion. His actions, during the courfe of his long fervice in Ruffia, demonstrate this to be true. He kept excellent discipline in his army, yet the foldiers called and effectmed him their father: He never was vain-glorious, no high language did he ever utter; every expression was modeft : But the word of command was refolution itfelf. The foldiers adored him.nor were they ever in the least afraid of any number of enemies, when he commanded them. He was always fuccefsful, and though he was wounded, yet he never was conquered. It would employ larger volumes than mine to give fome regular account of this great man. I shall therefore only observe, that he commanded an army of 40,000 regular troops in the Ukraine, when the late Empress Anna Joannovna died ; and when he received the orders to fwear, and alfo to caufe his army fwear fealty to the Duke of Courland, he would not do it. He had no objection to the Emperor John's being heir ; but he judged very prudently, that the Duke of Courland, being conflituted regent, never could be agreeable to the Grand Duchefs, nor the Prince ; wherefore, he perfuaded the army under his command to remain as they were, till the royal family's pleafure fhould be known :

known ; and for that very purpose dispatched a major, in whom he could put truft, with an account of his resolution, and advised the major to get into St Petersburgh, by unfrequented ways, dreffed as a peafant, and apply to the Grand Duchefs, or her royal hufband, perfonally. This was fuccefsfully effected ; but the Duke of Courland was arrefted, and fent to Shiffelburgh that night he arrived : However, the Grand Duchel's was well pleafed to fee that fhe had a general in chief, with fo refpectable a number of troops, who had nobly difdained to take oaths for the Duke of Courland, and only waited her Highnefs's orders, to refcue her from all danger. This great general was in St Peterfburgh at my arrival, defigned to command the army under his great friend Count Lacy, who ever entertained fo high an opinion of his military genius, that he never attempted any thing of moment without his approbation and concurrence. The Swedes infatuated, declared war, at a time when any fingle man might have forefeen their danger. The army of Ruffia was then not only numerous, but flushed with the many victories and conquests they had gained over the Turks, and commanded by their victorious generals, whom they really adored.

Declaration of War against Sweden.

THE Swedes were forward enough to declare war on the 28th of July, and the Russians on the 24th of August following. The declaration was read in the British chapel immediately after fervice, before any of the auditory were permitted to retire, and on Monday the army began to crofs the Neva in their way to Wilmanstrand, where General Wrangle lay ftrongly encamped with a body of 14,000 men. An accident happened in the night preceding the action, which might have difcouraged lefs refolute troops than the Ruffians. The Ruffians, at no great distance from the enemy, encamped on a rifing ground, almost furrounded with bogs. Orders were given to keep a fharp look-out during the night-time, and that if any thing was observed to ftir in the bogs, a fignal was to be given by the difcharge of a musket. The night was very dark, and a thick fog had fpread over all that country. Near morning a horfe had ftrayed into the bogs, and a centinel hearing fome noife from thence, fired (as he was commanded) his piece; when instantly the whole army was under arms. The regiment next to that centinel.

centinel, miftaking, in the fog, their friends for enemies, fired upon them, which was immediately returned, and many brave men were killed and wounded on both fides, before it was possible to difcover their error : However, this had no other bad effect upon the bravest troops in the world, than the loss, which was too great, of these few men.

The army marched ftraight to the enemy, whom they found ftrongly intrenched, with Wilmanstrand on their right, and a very well fortified camp on their left. The Ruffians attacked them with the greateft conduct and refolution imaginable. The Swedes, equally refolute, defended themfelves with great bravery from two o'clock, P. M. till nine at night, when the fhattered remains of their army furrendered themfelves prifoners of war. An ill advifed accident happened at the end of this action. The town of Wilmanstrand displayed their white flag, and offered to deliver it up to the Ruffians. The field-marfhal ordered a few of his beft troops to take poffellion of the gates ; Before they had marched half way, the Swedes upon the walls fired upon them, which exafperated them to fuch a degree, that a terrible carnage enfued. by and brd shod REAL MOUTH

At this inftant General Keith, who was every where, paffing by, afked who that was? and ordered him back to his former flation. Mr Fullerton affured the General that he had only obeyed the orders of his Major General. Keith fent off one of his adjutants in quest of the Major General, who was found far from danger : Bat Mr Keith, who could not relifh fo very abfurd an order, told Mr Uxkull of his error, and allo of his keeping far from danger. He then ordered him to remain in fuch a place from whence he could have a diffinct view of his division, and fend his orders without lofs of time. It was told me that thefe orders were fcarcely given, till Uxkull was killed with a cannon ball, as it were to go hence and answer for the blood of fo many brave men foolifhly fpilt. 5 med

All the ammunition, cannon, finall arms, grenadoes, tents, &c. belonging to the Swedifh army fell into the hands of the Ruffians; the fort of Willmanstrand was razed to the ground, and upwards of two thousand prisoners were dispatched into Ruffia, befides three thousand wounded foldiers. The brave General Wrangle was wounded and fent with the reft of the Swedish officers to St Petersburgh, and used with great humanity. He begged, and obtained his defire, that that he might be kept near Count Lacy, his conqueror. The Count gave him lodgings in his houfe, and frequently through the day vifited him, and although Mr Wrangle was near eighty years of age, he was very foon recovered.

This old General had been formerly a Leve prifoner in Ruffia, in Peter the Great's time, and had been obliged, before he could obtain liberty, to return home, to engage never to ferve against the Russians upon pain of death, and fuch an engagement he had figned. He no fooner was recovered, than the Empress Elizabeth, who then reigned, fent to congratulate him on his recovery, and expressed her defire to see him at Court. He accordingly went and paid his refpects. to her Majefty, but still he had fome diffidence that the Ruffian government might call him to an account for having ferved against them at this time; and therefore thought proper to hint as much to that most merciful Sovereign. She called him father, and expressed no finall surprise that he could entertain a thought that the Ruffians were fo barbarous ; affuring him of all liberty either to flay there, or retire to Sweden, upon his parole given not to ferve during this prefent war. But the expressed no fmall furprise that he, in fo advanced an age, could be prevailed upon, or indeed was able, to endure the fatigues of war. To which he only anfwered that

He farther declared that he, from principle purely, never would fight against her Imperial Majefty's intereft, but would be glad of all opportunities to fight against her enemies, provided only that Sweden was excepted. Upon which he obtained his liberty, and the Swedish officers were permitted to walk through the fireets of St Peterfburgh, and dine at any gentlemen's houfes, who were alfo recommended by the Court to use them with all manner of hospitality.

Concerning what happened to the Author, and the cruel Crafna Schoke.

HE battle of Wilmanstrand was fought upon the third of September. An order from the Medicine's Chancery was brought to my lodgings on the fifth, early in the morning, commanding my immediate attendance. When I entered the Chancery, the fecretary defired me to make all hafte to go for Wilmanstrand; because, faid he, the number of wounded is fo great that it is not pollible for the furgeons, and others to vifit them once in one day, and, telling me, that a memorial was making out for the Admiralty to acquaint them with this refolution. This was a blow I very little expected. I expoffulated with them as much as I was able. I put them in mind of my contract, by which they might learn that I never intended to ferve in the army : Then I defired them to reflect upon my having been near twenty months without pay, one farthing of which I had not as yet received: Laftly, I defired them to confider what the Board of Admiralty and others would think of them, when they daily fent to them fuch wavering unfettled memorials. To this an old fly tranflator, a German, named Waring, faid that the the Archiator defigned, as foon as a vacancy fhould happen, to advance me in the army. and had promifed me out of the Chancery two months pay as a prefent. By this time I had got a little more courage, and calm reafon was taking its place : I frankly anfwered, that from the very beginning of my fervices I was told, and indeed gave credit to it, that the Archiator defigned to advance me; that I hoped this would have taken place long before the time of my contract was expired : But that all thefe fine promifes had hitherto taken no other effect, than to make me quite diffident. That, as I was in pofferfion of atteffations from all my commanders concerning my good fervices, and from the Medicine's Chancery concerning my qualifications; and finally as the time of my engagement in the fervice was expired; I was determined to take my difinifion from it. To thefe reafonable remonstrances, I was told that fuch language was feldom heard in Ruffia, and that if I would not go voluntarily, there was no difficulty to fend me with a party of dragoons, Though I made anfwer, that if they fent me with dragoons, neither they not the dragoons could caufe me do what I would not; yet the dragoons ran fo much in my fancy all day, that I dreamed of them at night. Finding they could not get me to agree, they advised me to go to the Archiamile.

tor. I did fo, and our difcourfe ended much in the fame way as above, only with this remarkable difference, that the Archiator in great rage declared that I fhould be fent that very night.

I now for the first time, fince I arrived in Ruffia, began to be alarmed, and I could find none to fupport me, however just my caufe was, but the British Ambaffador. I loft, therefore, no time in reprefenting my grievances to him, though altogether a ftranger. The honourable Mr Finch our ambaffador, who was greatly careffed at court, ordered me to return to the chancery, and let them know from him, that if they broke through the agreement of our contract, or that if they fent me by an act of arbitrary power to any place, contrary to their fenfe of my agreement with them, he would efpouse my caufe, and have justice done me; and that he had ordered me to call daily at his houfe to acquaint his fecretary with their proceedings against me : And lastly, if they fent me away, he would apply to the Grand Duchefs, and get me brought back very foon, and would not fail to get them punished for their perfidy and tyranny. I made no manner of hefitation to report the ambaffador's meffage, at which they feemed not a little diffurbed. Whilft I was in the chancery, the Archiator arrived; and I, not knowing what would be my fate, depended upon Mr. Finch's promile.

mife, and, as I was defired, fat in the room waiting the iffue; for at this time all the doors where the Archiator and his counfellors were confulting, were not only fhut, but centinels placed at them, fo that it was impoffible to over-hear one word. After about half an hour's waiting, I was fummoned to I doubted not that they would attend. threaten much, and endeavour by fuch ways to prevail with me to fubmit, though I was firmly refolved to ftand it out to the laft extremity. But how much was I furprifed to hear the Archiator fpeak to me with more complaifance than ever he did before, and put into my hands at the fame time a memorial to the admiralty, acquainting them that the fub-furgeons and learners whom I had formerly required, agreeable to the regulations for the port at Aftrachan, were difpatched; therefore defiring the admiralty to grant their falaries and difpatches without lofs of time. He at this time never fpoke one word about the army or dragooning, but parted with me very refpectfully: The truth is, I had been informed, and experienced it to be true, that the honourable Mr Finch was remarkably diffinguished at that court, and that every college or office in St Peterfburgh was afraid of him; for he always fpoke out, and whatever he reprefented was well taken, and anfivered according to his defire. As I was walking home, Dr Smith, an Irifh gentleman, man, phyfician to the guards, met me, and faid that the Archiator had faid to him that I was extremely obfinate, &c. This gentleman, I dare fay, wifhed me very well, and fpoke the real fentiments of his mind. At the finishing of his discourse, he defired me to remember I was not in Great Britain, and withed I would fmell the ground. My anfwer was fhort, viz. that I had confidered every thing, and that though I had not been fo long in Ruffia as he, I had fmelled and measured twice as much Ruffian ground as he had, at leaft: That I had taken my measures, and was determined never to fubmit to do any thing, but what by my contract I had pointedly agreed to. This affair thus ended, and I never was troubled more about it.

The war was carried on with vigour on the Ruffians fide. Gen. Keith forced a very ftrong out-poft belonging to the Swedes, not without an equal lofs of men : But a barbarous affair happened at this time, which would have tarnifhed the glory of the Ruffian army, if it had been carried on by any of the regulars. A Coffack, called Crafna Schoke, or Red Cheeks, was bred in Peter the Great's army, and, for his bravery upon all occafions, was, by that Great Sovereign, created major-general of the irregular Coffacks. This Crafna Schoke was a perfect favage, nor was even Peter the Great able to reftrain his cruel difpofition, neither by threats nor punifhments. He was indeed frong, indefatigable, and took very little reft. Before the war was declared, he arrived in St. Peterfburgh with 4000 horfemen under his command. He one day was admitted into the prefence of the Grand Duchefs, who was pleafed to fay, that the was forry for all the horfe, but particularly the irregulars, becaufe no magazines had been erected for them. Crafna Schoke, without any hefitation, made anfwer, That if her Highnefs would only lofe no time in declaring war, he would afk no manner of forage for his horfes; but till that was done, he could not provide for them, and a very fhort delay would render them quite ufelels for war : He faid, that had Peter the Great followed his advice, there would have been no war at prefent; for, faid he, I advifed the Great Emperor to cut off women and children: Now, faid he, thefe very infants, then fucking their mothers breafts, and many born fince, are the people who form their army at prefent: Upon this declaration, the Great Duchel's let him know, that fhe and the whole ministry hated cruelty of all kinds ; that the effected Peter the Great for his humanity, as much at leaft, as for all his other great qualifications joined together. She used the force of all her rhetoric to diffuade him from cruelty, and ended her difcourfe by affuring him that he never could expect any effeem or regard from her, if he nfed ufed the enemy cruelly, but averred that the looked upon all fuch as the common enemics of mankind. Then, this generous and compaffionate Princels intreated the Field-marshal and General Keith carefully to observe Crasna Schoke's actions, and to reftrain his native fiercenefs and barbarity. However defpotic a regular general may exercife his great power over the irregulars in the Ruffian army, a prudent man finds himfelf obliged to use found policy, and take all the gentle ways poffible to gain his end ; wherefore these two great generals contented themfelves to diffuade Crafna Schoke to refrain from his former barbarous actions. and careffed him much above what either his rank, or any other qualifications had a title were not war at melent to tor, faid he. of

The battle of Wilmanstrand was scarcely ended, when Crasna Schoke and his men were amiffing. The generals had no doubt of his being fet out upon some of his irregular expeditions, but could not conceive what it might be. At last, after three or sour days absence, he appeared loaded with spoil, and many thousand heads of cattle. A few days after that, a major was dispatched from Count Lewenhaupt with expresses for Fieldmarshal Lacy, giving a particular account of the many hamlets and villages burnt to the ground, and every foul put to death, who unfortunately fell into the hands of that barbarian barbarian Crafna Schoke, and poffibly this major was charged with fome other affairs. The Field-marshal, agreeable to his natural politenefs, received the major, treated him, and entertained him as a gentleman, and laftly parted with him, after having been an hour in fecret difcourfe, openly conferring upon him fome marks of diffinction : Whether Crafna Schoke fulpected that complaints had been made to the Field-marshal or not, I never could learn; but the next morning he went off with only a handful of men, to reconnoitre the enemies fituation : he paffed fome miles on a narrow way, fituated betwixt mountains and an impaffable morafs, till he was at laft ftopped by a breaftwork, mounted with cannon, which he did not relifh; he therefore returned back the way he came, for there was no other; but had not retreated far till he was flopped by another breaft-work, which the enemy had thrown up whilft he was marching to the fartheft off one : He was there attacked brifkly, nor could he efcape ; he would not deliver himfelf and men up prifoners : At laft however he rode into the morals, but not far, till his horfe was drowned, and himfelf fhot : too good a death for fuch a man! The Swedes certainly had way-laid him, for they knew him well, and not fatisfied with having flot him, it was faid, they cut the dead 3 N body body all to pieces. Such was the end of this monfter of the human kind.

But this affair did not altogether end thus. for a body of the guards was at this time in the army, and a few of them were upon duty at the Field-marshal's tents, when the Swedish major had a conference with his Excellency. They, having observed the polite behaviour of the Field-marshal to the major, tho' an enemy, were prepoffeffed with a foolifh notion that the Field-marfhal was defigued to deliver the Ruffian army into the hands of Count Lewenhaupt; and, without great difficulty, brought the reft of the guards into their way of thinking; who fuddenly took to arms, without fo much as one officer, threatening to extirpate all the foreigners in the army: The Field-marshal committed their reduction to the care of General Keith, who, being their lieutenant-colonel, mounted immediately, after having given private orders to his adjutants, and rode calmly up to them, made inquiry into the caufe of their grievances, put them in mind that they never could attempt any thing of themfelves, and affured them that the refult would end in their destruction. He then advised them to put themfelves under his command, who was their lieutenant-colonel, and he would answer for it, that they should have fpeedy justice done them. They agreed to this and declared their fatisfaction to be commanded manded by the ever-victorious General Keith. He then commanded them to draw up and go through their exercise ; at last, he ordered them to ground their pieces, and march off the ground : At this inftant, a regiment of Cuiraffiers rode up, furrounded and difarmed them. They were inftantly fhackled and fent to St Petersburgh in carts; and thence difperfed in finall numbers in garrifons through the whole Empire, with ftrict orders to punish them with great feverity for every finall crime which they might be guilty of. Twenty or thirty of those mad-men were fent to Aftrachan; but the Princefs Elizabeth had mounted the throne before this happened; an account of which memorable affair I shall give, as I had it from good authority, though I acknowledge it is not agreeable to any other account hitherto given of it.
