DEAR SIR,

I Embrace the earliest opportunity of performing the promise I made you on my quitting England; and should the contents of the accompanying sheets, collected chiefly from personal observation, aided by the best local inquiries, acquit me, in your mind, of a breach of that promife, I shall feel myself more than happy :--- They had been more ample, but that I was impatient to pay a debt of gratitude that would not brook the loss of an opportunity; confequently you will find the conclusion rather abrupt; but by the next ship I shall, I trust, make amends, having nearly transcribed some letters from my friend, Mr. Wentworth, containing a pleasant narrative of the rise and progress of the settlement at Norfolk Island; together with fome farther particulars relative to,

SIR,

Your most obedient,

And obliged,

Humble Servant,

CHAP. I.

Am ordered for embarkation-Visited by my friends-Receive many presents-Escorted from Newgate to Blackfriars-Bridge by the city guard, and put on board a lighter-Proceed down the river-An accident alongfide the Ship-Receive great indulgence on board, through the interference of a friend-Situation of the convicts on board-The ship drops down to Gravefend. -The captain comes on board-Proceed to the Downs, and from thence to the Mother Bank-Join several transports for the same destination-The agent for transports comes on board-Makes the signal for failing-Get under weigh, and run through the Needles-Lofe fight of land-A violent gale.

T was with unspeakable satisfaction that I received a fummons to be ready early the next morning for my embarkation, agreeably to my fentence. I instantly made the most of my time, and, by the assistance of a friend, procured a few pounds' worth of necessaries for my voyage; government allowance being extremely flender, efpecially for one like me, who had hitherto been accustomed to most of the luxuries of the table. The news of my speedy departure brought several of my acquaintance to bid me adieu, and, with gratitude, I recollect that not one of them came empty handed; for, before the time of locking-up, I had fuch a collection of ventures, that I doubted whether I should be permitted to take them all on board: had each of my shipmates been as well stocked, it would have needed a ship on purpose.

About a quarter before five a general muster took place; and, having bid farewel to my fellow prisoners, we were escorted from the prison to Blackfriars-bridge by the city guard, where two lighters were waiting to receive us. This procession, though early, and but few spectators, made a deep impression on my mind; and the ignominy of being thus mingled with felons of all descriptions, many fcarce a degree above the brute creation, intoxicated with liquor, and fhocking the ears of those they passed with blasphemy, oaths, and fongs, the most offensive to modesty, inflicted a punishment more severe than the sentence of my country, and fully avenged that fociety I had fo much wronged.

Absorbed in the most humiliating meditation, the objects we paffed going down the river were totally unnoticed by me; nor was I rouzed from my lethargy till I received a violent blow on the head, which I took at first for a stroke with a stick, but on looking around me found we were alongfide the ship, and that the injury I had suftained proceeded from the boatfwain, who, standing on the gangway, had thrown a small coil of rope for some one on board the lighter to take hold of, to bring us alongfide, and-

and which unluckily came in contact with my head; this circumstance occasioned a laugh at my expence: but as I have always found that chagrin and ill-humour encreases the mortification. I stiffled my real sensations, and feemed to join in the mirth. In my turn I ascended the ship's side, and, to my great satisfaction, the first person I cast my eyes on was my particular friend, whose generous exertions not only procured me flowage for my packages, but also the liberty of walking the deck, unencumbered by those galling and ignominious chains which my past conduct had configned me to. Not content with these services, he prevailed on the boatswain to admit me into his mefs, which was composed of the second mate, carpenter, and gunner, who cheerfully acquiefced, on receiving my proportion towards defraying the extra requifites for the mess during the voyage. My benefactor, having rendered my fituation thus comfortable, bade me farewel, and left me: my heart fwelling with gratitude, was too full, and interdicted all verbal acknowledgments; but the remembrance is too ftrongly engraven thereon for the most distant time to effect the slightest eradication.

My fellow prifoners, to the amount of upwards of two hundred, were all ordered into the hold, which was rendered as convenient as circumstances would admit, battens being fixed fore and aft for hammocks, which were hung seventeen inches apart from each other: but being encumbered with their irons, together with the want of fresh air, soon rendered their situation truly deplorable. To alleviate their condition as much as was consistent with the safety of the ship, they were permitted to walk the deck in turn, ten at a time: the women, of whom we had fix, had a snug birth made for them, and were kept by themselves.

My

My messmate, the boatswain, had provided me with a neat flung hammock, and gave me a birth next his own; at the fame time addreffing fome of his shipmates who were prefent, with, "Lookee, my hearts, as I know you si are all above diffreffing a gentleman under misfor-" tunes, I'm fure you will confent to his having this here " birth; but if so be as how any of you don't like it, why, you may have mine-It isn't the first time I have " prick'd for the foftest plank." Whether from the oratory of my new friend, or the infinuating appearance of a large can of flip, produced from an ample liquor-case, which promifed a fuccession of the same arguments, the iron muscles of his auditors were fostened down to a significant fmile, and univerfal nod of affent. The fettling of this important bufiness afforded me great satisfaction, as it not only affured me a comfortable birth for my hammock, but a place also for my little property, which I could have immediately under my eye.

We lay about a week at Long-Reach, when we dropt down to Gravefend: here the captain came on board, and fome foldiers of the New South Wales corps; we got under weigh the next morning, and proceeded to the Downs, it blowing strong to the westward, we came to an anchor. The wind veering about, at day-break we were again under fail, and arrived at the Mother-Bank, where lay several other transports for the same destination.

It was about ten days before we were ready to fail from hence, the interval being employed in getting fresh stock, and replenishing our water. On the report of our being ready for sea being made to the admiral, a lieutenant of the navy came on hoard, as agent of transports, and immediately mediately made the fignal for the masters of the other ships to come on board, to whom he delivered their failing instructions; and on the following morning made the signal to weigh: by a quarter past nine we were under an easy fail; and it blowing a stiff easterly breeze, we ran through the Needles: it was delightful weather, and the prospect on each hand must have afforded the most agreeable sensations to every beholder, and is, perhaps, as rich and luxuriant as is any where to be met with; but, alas! it only brought a fresh pang to the bosom of one who in all probability was bidding it adieu for ever.

The weather continuing moderate, and the wind fair, we imperceptibly glid down the Channel, and had loft fight of Old England before I turned out the next morning. My frequent trips from Ireland to England had, in fome measure, inured me to falt water, nor did I want my fea-legs in a most violent gale, which took place the third day after we loft fight of the land, and which for near ten hours baffled the skill of all hands: two men were blown from the main-top-fail yard, and the fail fplit to ribbands; all our endeavours to fave the men proved ineffectual. Soon after our fore-top mast went over the fide, and carried four men and two boys with it; but they were providentially taken up, having kept fast to the wreck. By the indefatigable exertions of the feamen, the remainder of the fails were handed, and the ship greatly eased, carrying only a storm-stayfail; the sea running very high and irregular, rendered it very uncomfortable; and not being capable of any fervice upon deck, I retired to my hammock, where I buried all thoughts of the contentious ocean in a found fleep, from which I was awaked by the shrill whistle of my messmate, piping all hands to breakfast; fast; the cheering sound of "steady" from the helmsman, saluting my ears, and the quietness of the ship assured me the gale was past. Having huddled on my cloaths, I found, on my ascending the deck, the storm had subsided, the wind perfectly fair, and the ship jogging on under an easy sail, at the rate of about seven miles an hour.

CHAP. II.

Confpiracy of the convicts—daring attempt to seize the Ship—The mutiny quelled—Gain the captain's friend-Ship and considence by my behaviour during the mutiny—Arrive at Tenerisse—Description of the town and harbour of Santa Cruz—Indulged with permission to go on shore—Visit Oratava, a town in the vicinity of the Peak—Account of the country surrounding that mountain—Return to the ship.

proved much more fatal: the captain, with great humanity, had released many of the convicts who had been in a weakly state from their irons; and, as I have before observed, they were allowed alternately, ten at a time, to walk upon deck. Two of them, Americans, who had some knowledge of navigation, prevailed upon the majority of their comrades to attempt seizing the ship, impressing them with the idea that it would be eafily effected, and that they would carry her to America, where every man would not only attain his liberty, but receive receive a tract of land from Congress, besides a share of the money arising from the sale of the ship and cargo.

These arguments had the desired effect, and it was determined the first opportunity that a part of those on the deck should, while the officers were at dinner, force the arm-chest, which was kept on the quarter-deck, at the same time make a signal to two of them, who should be keeping the centinels in discourse, to attack them, get pos-fession of their arms, and pass the word for those below to rush upon deck.

This conspiracy was conducted with the greatest secrecy, and put in execution with equal spirit and audacity. A favourable opportunity presenting itself, the captain and most of the officers being below, examining the stowage of some wine, a cask having leaked out in the spirit room, I was the only person on the deck excepting the man at the helm; hearing a fcuffle on the main-deck, I was going forward, but was stopped by one of the Americans, followed by another convict, who made a stroke at me with a fword he had wrested from one of the eentinels, which was put afide by a piftol which the other had just fnapped at me; I fnatched up a handspike luckily in my reach, and brought the foremost to the ground: the man at the helm had quitted the wheel, and called up the captain. I still kept my fituation, guarding the paffage of the quarter-deck, my antagonists having retreated a few paces, but being joined by many others, were rushing on me, when the discharge of a blunderbuss from behind me among them wounding feveral, they retreated, and I was immediately joined by the captain and the rest of the officers, who, in a few minutes, drove them all into into the hold. An attempt of this kind required the most exemplary punishment; accordingly two of the ringleaders were instantly hung at the yard-arm, and several others severely slogged at the gangway.

As foon as the conspirators were re-ironed, and the tranquillity of the ship restored, the captain paid me many handsome compliments, in having, as he was pleased to say, saved the ship, and assured me that when we arrived at the Cape he should, on the part of his owners, think it his duty to reward the service I had, by my courage and presence of mind, rendered them; at the same time he gave his steward orders to supply me with any thing I might have occasion for from his store-room during the voyage.

I foon experienced the good effects of my late behaviour, as feldom a day paffed but some fresh meat or poultry was fent me by the captain, which considerably raised me in the estimation of my messimates, who were no ways displeased at the substitution of a sea pie made of fowl or fresh meat, to a dish of Lobscouse, or a piece of falt junk.

With a fettled north-westerly breeze we gradually proceeded to the southward, at the rate of between eighty and one hundred miles in twenty-sour hours: we soon reached the island of Tenerisse, and came to an anchor in the bay of Santa Cruz, which is defended by several batteries of three or sour guns each, at certain distances from each other, round the bay, and close to the water's edge; their principal fort is near to the landing-place, and mounts a number of heavy cannon; it is a strong work, work, but there being a good depth of water close in shore, it could not sustain the attack of two ships of the line, though the whole of the batteries mount more than one hundred pieces of cannon.

The town of Santa Cruz is very irregularly built, the principal street being so broad, that it looks more like a square than a street: the house of the governor, which is at the upper end, is a very indifferent looking building, and has more the appearance of an Auberge than the palace of a Spanish grandee; at the other end is a square monument, commemorating the appearance of Our Lady to the Guanches, the Aborigines of the island. The outskirts appear like a deserted village rather than a place of trade, many of the houses being either half built, or fallen to decay from some cause or other; and the stone walls, which were their principal sences, are broken down and in ruins.

Some of the officers having obtained leave from the agent of transports to visit the town of Oratava, a few miles from Santa Cruz, we having completed our water and fresh stock, and waiting for the other transports who had not been so alert; on my expressing a desire to see the town, I was permitted to be of the party. The country is exceedingly beautiful and fertile, notwithstanding the frequent convulsions of the neighbouring volcanos: we arrived at Oratava about noon, and by signs, for none of us were masters of the language, we got a sew eggs, and plenty of small wine. We had scarcely taken our seats, when we were relieved from the inconvenience attending our not being acquainted with the language, by the arrival of an old Spanish soldier, who had been some time a prisoner in England, and spoke our tongue tolerably well: we informed him we had come from Santa Cruz to take a nearer view of the Peak, and, if time would admit, to ascend it. He said it was impossible at this time of the year, as no guides would undertake to accompany us, and that feveral of the goatherds who had ventured after their goats, had perished from the intensenels of the cold, but that he would take us as far as was prudent for us to venture. We thanked him for the offer, and accordingly walked about a league from the town into the plain, which extends to the base of the Peak, and had a full view of this stupendous mountain. Immense quantities of lava, and huge fragments of rocks, evidently vomitted from the crater of the volcano, covered the plains, and nearly reached the town: we gathered fome small pieces which had been sparred off, and found them impregnated with inflammable matter, and as hard as flint. I meafured one of the pieces of rock with fome twine I had about me, and afterwards found it was near feventy feet in circumference. Our time being short, and the weather intenfely cold, we returned to Oratava, and got fome falt fifh, with a few hard eggs for fupper, to which our old foldier invited himself, but amply repaid us for his intrufion by a lively and humourous description of the squabbles of his neighbours, the knavery practifed by the mountaineers on the curious and exploring ftranger; his own heroism against the Moors, and at the fiege of Gibraltar, where he was taken prifoner, with his amours while in England: the intervals were fupplied by feveral fongs from a company of muleteers, who, by their extreme vociferation intirely discomposed the ferenity of our loquacious guest, and, but for my mediation, would have produced a ferious quarrel between them. Our leave of absence from the ship extending till fun-fet the fucceeding day, we enquired of our interpreter if we could be provided with beds; he gave us to understand that a bed was an article of luxury. little known to the generality of the Oratavians, but he would get us mats to fleep on, which we were fain to be contented with; and in spite of the indefatigable labour of myriads of every species of vermin, I enjoyed as profound a fleep as though I had refled on a bed of down. A little before funrise we were waked by the veteran, who had come to partake of our breakfast, and shew us the town. Not having stripped, we foon made our appearance at the table, where he had provided half a dozen fmall loaves, fome baccalo, and a quantity of dried grapes; he had also boiled a large iron kettle of coffee, but there being no fugar or milk at hand, we were glad to fubstitute some flasks of Teneriffe for our beverage.

Oratava is fituated on the declivity of a rugged hill, gradually floping to the fea, and commands a fine view of the bay, which, from the number of shoals, will only admit ships of a small draught of water, and here merchantmen of this description generally anchor, as wine, fruits, and vegetables, are procured at Oratava much cheaper than at Santa Cruz. It is certainly the most fertile fide of the island, and, in a great measure, supplies all the rest. Nothing can be more charming or romantically fituated than this delightful fpot: the houses are low, but remarkably neat, and of white stone. On one side the street runs a pleafant rivulet from a copious spring of the cleareft and sweetest water, which, in its progress over a rugged pavement, murmurs most agreeably along. Hills rising above hills, crowned with woods of the most luxuriant foilage, C2 foilage, and beautifully canopied with variegated clouds; and the stupendous Peak, towering its majestic head above the whole, forms a prospect most sublimely interesting.

The furrounding valleys, adorned with vineyards, and watered by innumerable streams, forming natural cascades, complete the picture.

At noon we began to think of returning to the ship; and taking leave of Don Gasparo, the old soldier, we reached Santa Cruz by sunset, and, one of the boats being luckily on shore, immediately went on board, highly gratified with our excursion.

THE ships having completed their watering, the A fignal was made for every person belonging to the fleet to repair on board their respective vessels, and the next morning the fignal to get under weigh: with a pleafant breeze, we foon loft fight of the land. We steered to the fouth-west till we were in the meridian of Saint Jago, when we shaped our course with an intention of coming to an anchor in Port au Prayo Bay; but when we opened the bay were taken aback, and a fliff breeze blowing direct in our teeth, it was thought that an attempt to gain the bay would be attended with fome rifk and much loss of time, it was therefore determined to give up the idea, and a fignal was made for that purpose. We then shaped our course to the southward, and as we crossed the Equinoctial Line the ceremony of shaving and ducking was punctually observed: at noon, a hoarse voice hailed the ship, as from the sea, with "Ho! the ship, ho!" which was answered by one stationed for the purpose, with " Hallo! what ship's that?" "The Albermarle." "I " don't recollect her paffing this way before-I shall 66 come come on board and examine her." Upon which half a dozen most grotesque figures entered the ship, as if from the bosom of the deep; having previously slung a grating under each bow as a flage to afcend from; with great folemnity they proceeded to the quarter-deck: the principal personages were Neptune and Amphitrite, attended by their nymphs and neriads, personated by the oldest seamen in the ship, but so disfigured with red ochre, robes, and wigs, made of ravelled foun yarn, that it was a difficult matter to recognize their persons. After receiving a double toll from the captain, it being the first time of the thip's croffing the line, confifting of half a gallon of liquor, and two pounds of fugar, they, in turn, questioned every person on deck. When any one said he had croffed before, and had not, his watry majesty, with great dignity, turning to one of his attendants, who held a large book, faid, "Look if you have this gentleman down in my log " book?" which being answered in the negative, the rum and fugar was instantly demanded. When it came to my turn, my friend, the captain, defired them to put my quota down to him. Having finished with the quarter-deck, they proceeded to the examination of their own comrades, after having prepared for the ceremony of treating those who could not pay with a view of Neptune's cellar; for this purpose they had made a tackle fast to the main yardarm, through which they rove a rope, with an iron crow made fast to the end for a feat. The only exhibition was on the person of the cook, who not being of the most conciliatory disposition, most of the ship's company owed him a grudge; and as he peremptorily refused to pay, although in his power, they placed him on the crow, and brought the yard rope between his legs, making another fast round him, to prevent a possibility of his falling; they then then fwung him off, and running him close up tothe yard, fouled the poor devil from the heighth of near fifty feet into the water; this they performed thrice: when they took him on board he was so much exhausted that his life was thought in danger, which put an end to this part of the ceremony, and the other defaulters were let off with only a shaving, performed by Neptune and his assistants: the party was feated on a piece of board placed aerofs a large tub; the razor part of an iron hoop, and the foap not the finest Windsor, but a composition of tar, tallow, and every filth they could collect: the difagreeableness of this operation exclusive of the smart, the hand of the shaver not being of the lightest, occasions a struggle to get from under it, in which the board whereon he is feated gives way, and poor pilgarlick is unexpectedly emerged over head and ears in bilge water. Those destined for this operation are kept close prisoners, so that they are totally ignorant of what they are to go through, but when the ordeal is once passed they think no more of it, but shake their ears, and affift in carrying on the joke. The forfeits made them all as merry as grigs, and the day closed with dancing and fongs on the forecastle, and every body, the cook excepted, forgot their temporary mortifications, and joined in the evening's conviviality.

A most favourable breeze wasted us pleasantly along till we made Cape Frio: at midnight we were abreast of the Cape, which is a small island, distant two or three miles from the main land. We had very little wind and variable weather between the Cape and Rio Janiero, a distance of fifty or fixty miles. A spurt of wind from the sea carried us within the islands, when we came to an anchor off the harbour's mouth. The next morning the agent went on shore to wait on the viceroy, and in the afternoon we weighed and failed into the harbour; as we passed the fort we faluted them with thirteen guns, which was returned by eleven (we not being a man of war) and came to an anchor abreast the town. The thips in general were remarkably healthy, and had hitherto buried but few of the convicts: in our paffage from Teneriffe to this place we loft only four men and one woman, which is a very inconfiderable number, confidering their confined state, change of climate, and unwholesomeness of living to long entirely on falt provisions. Fresh meat and vegetables were brought from the shore immediately on our coming to an anchor, and feveral country boats, with Pines, Bannanas, Oranges, and every species of tropical fruits, came alongfide, of which the convicts had a certain proportion ferved them; the fruits being in fuch plenty that the expence of distributing a few to each individual every morning was very inconfiderable.

The harbour is very commodious, and will contain almost any number of ships, where they may ride in perfect fecurity from bad weather. The city of Saint Sebastian is tolerably large, and regularly built; but from its being situated on low swampy ground, surrounded by high hills, which entirely exclude it from the refreshing sea and land breezes, so that in the summer months it is insupportably hot, and of course very unhealthy. Some sew of the streets are pretty wide, but in general they are rather too narrow; the square opp site the landing-place is spacious, and on the south side stands the palace of the vice-roy, a very handsome stone building, and is said to be very richly ornamented within. The inside of the churches are "recorated with the utmost profusion, and most of them surnished

Here mechanics and tradefimen carry on their business in distinct parts of the town, particular streets being appropriated for particular trades: here you will find a whole street of gun-smiths, another of taylors, a third of carpenters, &c. &c.

The numerous forts and batteries which furround Saint Sebastian give it an air of strength, but an enemy getting possession of the island of Cobres, which is very near to and overlooks the town, assisted by a few large ships, for which there is plenty of water, would soon oblige it to capitulate.

The produce and exports of Rio Janeiro are gold, sugar, rice, coffee, and most of the valuable drugs: we took a collection of seeds, and some young shoots of the Tamarind, Banana, Orange, Lemon, and Guava trees, in order to try them on the soil of New South Wales,

E lay here about three weeks, when the fick being pretty well recovered, the ships replenished with water, and loaded with vegetables and fruits of all kinds, the signal was made for failing, and for the first three or four days we preceded with a brisk north-easter-ly wind, when suddenly it became dark and cloudy, with tremendous peals of thunder, and vivid sashes of lightning, from every part of the horizon, attended with violent squalls of wind, but of no long continuance. At day break the wind shifted to the southward, and we had a series of sine weather till we arrived at the Cape of Good Hope, on the twentieth of July, and about sunset came to an anchor in Table-Bay.

This being the last port we could touch at for refreshments during the remainder of the voyage, all hands set to work to procure such articles as they might stand in need of, as well for their present consumption, as for their suture comfort in the new colony.

Early

Early in the morning the captain ordered the pinnace to be manned, and went on shore; from whence he returned about noon, and sending for me aft, gave me an order on a merchant in Cape Town for one hundred dollars; at the same time telling me that I might at any time take the opportunity of the boats going on shore, to visit the town as often as I pleased, only speaking to the officer on deck when I was so disposed. The considence he reposed in me struck me more forcibly than the money, and I was really so consused that I could scarcely articulate my acknowledgments.

During our stay here I visited the town almost every day, taking care to be on board by sunset; and laid out the money I had received in such articles as were most in request in New Holland.

On entering a house in Cape Town, you are always presented with a Sopi, that is to fay a glass of arrack, geneva, or, perhaps, French brandy: Geneva, however, is the common morning dram. Before they fit down to table the etiquette is to offer a fopi of white wine, in which aloes or wormwood have been freeped, to create an appetite: at table they drink beer or wine indifcriminate-The beer is much effeemed, but they place a higher value on English porter. After the desert, which is always plentifully supplied, they bring pipes and tobacco, and continue drinking and fmoking till late in the evening. This is their usual manner of living, with the exception of those in indifferent circumstances, who drink their own wine; but in this particular the vanity of the inhabitants is often highly ridiculous: one day as I was walking with an acquaintance I had made at the Cape,

he made me observe a man feated at the door of his houses who seeing we were near him, began calling to his flave to bring him fome red wine, though he affured me he had not a fingle drop in his houle, and that most likely he had not talled wine ten times in his life. When we had paffed-a little way, I turned and faw that his flave had brought him a glass of beer, which he with great oftentation deliberately drank off. For twelve miles round the Cape the colonists do not employ the Hottentots, chusing rather to purchase negroes, who are more industrious and trustworthy. The Hottentot, careless and inconstant by nature, often go away from their mafter on the prospect of hard work, and frequently leave them in embarraffment: the negroes defert also, but vain are their efforts to regain their liberty: they are foon retaken, and fent to the bailiff of the canton, from whom they are redeemed by the proprietor for a small sum. Their correction is much less severe than one would expect; indeed there are few places where flaves are treated with more humanity than at the Cape.

The Creole flaves are most esteemed at the Cape, and fetch double the price of any other: if they are initiated in any business, their price is exhorbitant. A good cook is worth from eight to twelve hundred rix dollars; mechanics, double that sum; and others in proportion. They are commonly neatly dressed, but walk barefoot, as a mark of slavery. There are none of that insolent tribe called footmen; luxury and pride not having yet introduced that useless lumber in the antichambers of the opulent.

The negroes of Madagascar and Mosambique are looked upon as the most ingenious and best workmen; they are also the most affectionate and faithful to their masters; when they are first landed at the Cape, they ufually fell for one hundred and twenty to one hundred and fifty piastres a head. The Indians are more employed in houshold work in the town; there are also some Malayans, but they are the most subtle and dangerous of all other flaves, frequently affaffinating their mafters or mistresses. When taken they go to execution with the greatest indifference. I heard one of these wretches publickly declare, at the place of execution, that he was glad he had committed the crime, as they were only going to fend him to his native country: it is a matter of wonder with me, that these ideas are not productive of much greater mischiefs.

I frequently dined at a Table d'Hote, or ordinary, where I fell in with a very intelligent Frenchman, who had traverfed great part of the interior of the country, and from time to time related many entertaining particulars; from among which I felected the following account of one of his journies to the country of the Auteniquas, which I hope will not appear tedious to my readers:

"A traveller having arrived at the Cape, and fignifying his intention of vifiting the interior of the country, I immediately offered him my fervices. The bargain was foon struck, and I instantly set about procuring the necessary articles for the journey. We set out on our expedition in the middle of December, when I led the way towards Dutch Hottentote, our company consisting of four horses, two of which were mounted by my master and myself, myself, the others by two Hottentots, in case any accident should befall ours; there were three other natives, and each his dog: we stopped at the decline of day at the foot of those high mountains that border the east of the Cape.

"After two days journey we passed a little rivulet, and arrived at a wood called Le Bois de Grand Pére, near the country of the Auteniquas, which we found inhabited from the fummit of the mountains to the water's edge by the colonists, who breed vast quantities of cattle, make butter, gather honey, and cut wood for fuel, as well as for the mechanic; these articles are all sent to the Cape. It is aftonishing that these people who have such plenty of timber, do not build themselves tenable houses, instead of being content with miferable huts, formed of hurdles covered with earth. The skin of a buffalo, stretched on four stakes, serves for a bed; a mat closes the door-way, which is also the window; two or three clumfy stools, fome pieces of plank joined together make their table, and an ill-made box, of about two feet square, compose the whole furniture of one of these dens. In other respects these people live luxuriously; they have plenty of game and fish, and enjoy the advantage over the other colonists, in having all the year without interruption their gardens well stocked with all kinds of vegetables.

"These advantages are owing to the goodness of the foil, and the natural waterings from the various rivulets that wind and cross each other in a thousand different directions, laying under contribution, if it may be so expressed, the four seasons of the year.

"In fearching for a Touraco, which Monfieur my mafter had shot, he fell into a pit upwards of twelve feet deep, which had been dug by the Hottentots, to entrap wild beasts, particularly the Elephant. Fortunately the hole was empty, and he had the good fortune to escape being impaled alive on the pointed stakes fixed at the bottom of these pits: they are generally slightly covered over with stender branches of trees, and the interstices silled with turf and moss; the roots most anxiously sought after by the Elephant are strewed on the surface, and the unweildy animal eagerly pressing forward after his favourite food, is easily entrapped by the wily Hottentot into the snare: being wounded by his sall, he is soon dispatched.

After many fruitless efforts to extricate himself, I being at some distance with the Hottentots, he fired his fufee, and by that means brought us back to his affiftance. This accident, however ferious, did not prevent him purfuing the wounded bird, which at length he found, and confidered the acquifition as a full compensation for all his perils. The Touraco is as agreeable in its form, as in the sweetness and melody of its notes; it is of a bright green, a tuft of the fame colour, bordered with white, adorns its head; its eyes a sparkling red, with a streak over them of the most dazzling white; its wings are a beautiful purple, varying to the violet, according to the point of light in which it is viewed. It is reckoned by the naturalists a species of the Cuckoo; but they have been much mistaken, as it has not the least affinity with that bird. The Cuckoo, in every part of the world, subfifts on snails and infects, but the Touraco is fruvigorous. In whatever part of the world the Cuckoo may be, it is remarkable that the never builds a nest, but days her eggs in those of other birds, and by this means saves herself the trouble of rearing her young; the Touraco, on the contrary, is careful of its samily, builds a nest, and hatches her own eggs: this difference in their disposition is, I think, a sufficient reason to prove them a particular species."

when one of the Hottentots came running up to me, and faid he had discovered the haunt of an Elephant. After some hours fatigue, painfully tracing him through a thick part of the wood, rendered almost impassable from the thorns and briars, we arrived at an open part of the forest, in which was a clump of shrubs and underwood: here we stopped while one of the Hottentots ascended a tree; after looking round him, he clapped his singer on his mouth as a token for us to be filent, then by opening and closing his hand several times (a signal before agreed upon) gave us to understand how many Elephants he had discovered.

ss We

We now held a council of war, the refult of which was, that the person who had seen them from the tree should lead us as near as possible through the bushes to the spot where he had discovered them. In a few minutes I was very near one of those enormous animals, which I did not immediately perceive, not that fear had fascinated my fight, but that I could scarce believe that the prodigious immoveable mass beneath me was the animal we had fo much wished to encounter. It should be observed we were on a hillock which raised us above the back of the animal: I still kept looking farther on, and rather took what was so near me for a fragment of rock than a living creature. The Hottentot now cried out, " See, see there! there he is," with a tone of the utmost impatience. At length a slight motion caught my eye, and immediately after the head and tufks, which the enormous body had in part concealed, were turned towards me: Monfieur, who was close behind me, without loling time, let fly at bim; I immediately followed his example, and both shots took place in his head; he staggered and fell: the noise frighted the rest, and they, to the number of thirty, scampered off as fast as their unweildy corporations would permit them. This was but the prelude to a more animated scene.

"While we were examining the animal we had killed, another paffed just by us, which was fired at by one of the Hottentots, and by the blood that trickled down his huge shoulders I imagined he was mortally wounded, and immediately pursued him. He would have laid down, but was prevented by our repeated firing; he then took to the thickest part of the wood; we followed him into a thicket, in which was a number of decayed trees that had fallen through age. The beast now became enraged from the number of his wounds, and made furiously at a Hottentot who had just discharged his piece at him, and in an inflant trod him to death, and thursting one of his tulks into the body, with a tols threw it upwards of thirty yards from him. We were about five-and-twenty paces from the poor fellow, my mafter a few paces behind me; I was too much encumbered for speed, my carbine being very heavy, and having a good deal of ammunition, together with a net containing feveral large birds, flung across my shoulder: I ran with all my might, but the enraged animal no fooner cast his angry eyes on me, than he purfued me at a full gallop, and gained ground every instant. More dead than alive through fear, abandoned by the Hottentots, who, checked by the fate of their comrade, were less courageous than usual, the only chance I had was to lie down close to the trunk of a large tree that was near me, which I had fcarce time to accomplish before the animal ran over it; but scared at the hooting of the Hottentots instantly stopped, as it were to listen. I could eafily have hit him from my fituation had I chose, but although my piece was loaded, I restrained firing; for though he had received fo many wounds I despaired to difable him by a fingle shot, so kept my situation, every moment expecting to become a prey to the enraged beaft.

"The Hottentots, having lost fight of me, as I lay close under the tree, not daring to shir, and not answering to their repeated cries, were persuaded I was already crushed to pieces, made the woods re-echo with their shouts. The Elephant, turning hastily round, passed me a second time, and, stepping over the tree not six yards from me, went off on a full gallop. I sprung on my seet his career, but rushing into the thickest part of the woods, disappeared.

"The report of my piece was an universal figural of joy. I was immediately surrounded by the Hottentots; whose countenances beamed the most lively and disinterested emotions of gladness: my master in the most affectionate terms expressed his fatisfaction at my escape, pressing me eagerly in his arms. Night drawing on, we returned to find the Elephant we had killed in the morning. The carcase was already in the possession of several large birds of prey, who had lost no time, having already made great progress in its diffection.

" Fires were now quickly kindled; and our attendants, after having pitched the tent, began to flew their skill in cooking. They cut off feveral fleaks to broil for themfelves, dreffing a part of the trunk for us: it was the first time I had ever tafted this kind of food, but I determined it should not be the last, as I thought it delicious. Having fettled the necessary preliminaties of watching round the tent, we went to rest, with as much composure as though we were at an inn; nor were we diffurbed 'till' funrife, when we fet forward on our journey. As we paffed a finall river we met a company of Hottentots, of about a score, who had fled from the wars of the Caffres: By our guides we learnt that those people are most vilely calumniated: the perpetual vexations and tyranny of the colonists gave rife to those wars, in which the Caffres have been represented as ferocious animals, nurtured with human gore, sparing neither age nor fex, and totally re-7 40 E 2 gardleis gardless of the rights of hospitality. The colonists often form pretences of losing their cattle, purposely to make inroads into the Castree settlements, exterminating whole hordes without distinction of age or sex, carrying away their herds, and laying waste the country; this being an easier method of obtaining cattle than rearing them.

"In destroying a small settlement of Cassres, a child of about twelve years of age escaped the general carnage, by concealing himself in a hollow tree, but, unfortunately, was discovered by one of the Marauders, who determined to make a slave of his prize. The commander of this barbarous detachment peremptorily laid claim to the little trembling prisoner; the captor as sirmly resused to deliver him up, which so enraged the savage leader that he ran with the utmost sury at the innocent object of the dispute, exclaiming—" If I must not have him, neither shalt thou!" and accompanied these words with a blow of his sabre, which laid the unfortunate victim dead at his feet.

Month noon one of our people who had gone on fome hundred yards before us, came running back with evident marks of confusion: on enquiring the cause, he told us there was a Lion couching in a thicket a little a-head of us, and that he would certainly attack us if we proceeded. We immediately halted to consult what was to be done: Monsieur, desirous of adding the spoil of the king of the forests to his other acquisitions, decided on the attack. Accordingly the horses and dogs were given in charge to one of the natives to keep them back, and we, to the number of sive, marched on, keeping a sharp-look out. We had proceeded near half a mile, and finding nothing, concluded it was an imaginary Lion, only only in the idea of Eaco (the name of the Hottentot who had given us the intelligence), who having lately loft a very good miftrefs, killed by one of those animals, was in continual dread of them.

"Her habitation being on the skirts of a wood, one gloomy night the family was awakened by the lowing of the cattle, in an inclosure at a small distance from the house: they immediately feized their fire-arms, and running to the fpot, found a Lion had broken through the fence, and was making terrible havock among the cattle. It was only necessary to enter the enclosure, and fire, to kill the animal; but neither of her fons, fervants, or flaves, had fufficient courage to attempt it. The undaunted matron, therefore, entered alone, and, armed with a musket, approached the scene of carnage: the darkness of the night prevented her perceiving the animal till fhe was close to him, when she courageously fired, but was so unfortunate as only to wound him; he instantly rushed upon her: the foreams of the unfortunate mother brought her fons to her affistance. Furious-desperate-distracted-they flew upon the tremendous animal, and killed him, though too late to fave her, and he fell breathless on the mangled body of their parent. Exclusive of the deep wounds she had received from the fangs and talons of the ferocious favage, he had bit one of her hands off at the wrift. Affistance was ineffectual; the died the fame night amidst the vain lamentations of her pullanimous fons and fervants.

The remembrance of this scene had made so deep animpression on the mind of Eaco, and filled him with suchapprehensions, that he had frequently teazed his comrades with false alarms, of being near the dens of Lions, and ofbeing.

being fure of feeing him in fuch and fuch a thicket, for that at last they paid little or no regard to his representations, and, in the prefent instance, acquainted us with his disposition, and advised me to order the Horses forward, and to continue our route, as we were three days from any habitation, and our provisions near exhausted. The trembling Eaco at this inffant cried, "There, there!" when hearing a ruftling among the bushes I haftily looked round, and faw the beaft in the act of fpringing upon his prey, one of the Hottentots being within his reach: as fwift as lightning he darted upon the poor fellow; but rather overleaping himfelf, in bringing him to the ground his fore-quarters extended fo far over him, that his antagonist, with the utmost intrepidity and presence of mind, clasped him firmly round the middle, and pressing him to his breast, the animal was fo fituated that he could do him little or no injury; at this moment one of his comrades ran to his affiffance, and clapping the muzzle of his piece to his ear, dispatched him instantaneously, and thus providentially delivered his fellow fervant unhart from this' imminent danger,

"This narrow cscape, added to the loss of our man killed by the Elephant, rather abated the ardour of our pursuit, and Monsieur began seriously to think of returning to the Cape, which we reached without any remarkable occurrence happening. In our way I shot an eagle of a species hitherto unknown, and considered as a great rarity by my master: it was of a bright black, with a ring of burnished gold round his neck, and seemed to resemble the vuiture as much as the eagle, though different in some instances. Hunger changes the eagle into a vulture; that is to say, when it is hungry it will seed on putrished.

trified carrion. It is a vulgar error that this bird only Subfifts by preying on others; for I have frequently feen Eagles, as well as other carnivorous birds, attracted by the offal of the beafts we had killed." He also related some particulars respecting the Hottentots, completely refuting the accounts of our geographical writers, who defcribe a most filthy custom used by the Hottentots at their marriage ceremonies; the priest being faid to bestow publick, ly a urinary ftream on the bride and bridegroom, in prefence of all the affembled friends. The formalities of those marriages, he said, consisted in the promises they made each other to live together as long as they may find it convenient; the engagement made, the young couple, from that moment, are man and wife. They then kill fome sheep, sometimes an ox, to celebrate this little holiday. The parents on both fides furnish the young couple with some cattle; they immediately apply themselves to the construction of a hut, forming an inclosure, and in getting together their little stock of necessaries. They live together as long as a good understanding subfifts between them; for should any difference arise, which is not likely to subside, they make no scruple of separation, but part with as little ceremony as they met; and each, free to form fresh connexions, seeks elsewhere a more agreeable partner.

In cases of separation, the effects of the married pair are equally divided; but should the husband, in his quality of master, insist on retaining the whole, the wise never fails to find those who will affert and defend her right; her family interests itself, nor are the friends of the man idle; so that, sometimes, the whole horde is in a ferment; in the end they come to blows, and, as in all other places, the conquerors give laws to the vanquished. The mother always has the care of the younger children, especially if they are girls, while the boys, who are able to follow their father, are sure to belong to him. These disagreements, however, are far from being common; and it is equally worthy of remark that they have no known law, or established custom, to which they can refer for the termination of their differences.

Among those Hottentots who are the most distant from the colonists, conjugal sidelity is held more facred than among the polished offspring of refinement; though polygamy is not repugnant to the customs of the Hottentots, it is by no means common among them. They may take as many wives as they please; but whether from a love of peace, or any other motive, seldom have but one. Women are never known to cohabit with two men. Nature, that would ever have a man able to ascertain his own offpspring, has wisely planted in the heart of a semale Gonaquais Hottentot, an invincible aversion from such infamous prostitution; nay, so disgusting is it to these people, that a husband, on a knowledge of the most trisling insidelity of his wise, might kill her, without sear of incurring the reproach of his horde.

With ideas of honor such as these, the reader will the more easily be induced to discredit the affertions of many writers; that the Hottentots indulge in connexions of an incessuous nature. It being hinted that strong suspicions of this fort had been entertained of them, they shewed signs of the greatest detestation. "Do you take us for brutes?" said they, and immediately broke off all farther farther converse; nor could all we had to fay prevail on them to forget the offence.

W VAVING completely stored the ship with provifions and water, taken in fix hundred casks of flour for the colony, and various other stores, the fignal was made for the transports to be in readiness to get under weigh. I bade my new friend adieu, hastened on board, and the next morning we worked out of the bay. We had scarcely got a tolerable offing when a very heavy gale blew from the northward, and the fea foon ran mountains high. The veffel being deep loaded, we shipped fome very heavy feas, which obliged us to lay too near four-and-twenty hours.

I had often heard of the superstition of failors respecting apparitions, but had never given much credit to the report: it feems that fome years fince a Dutch man of war was loft off the Cape, and every foul on board perished; her confort weathered the gale, and arrived soon after at the Cape. Having refitted, and returning to Europe they were affailed with a violent tempest nearly in the same latitude. In the night watch some of the people faw, or imagined they faw, a veffel flanding for them under a press of fail, as though she would run them down: one in particular affirmed it was the ship that had foundered in the former gale, and that it must certainly be her, or the apparition of her; but on its clearing up, the object (a dark thick cloud) disappeared. Nothing could do away the idea of this phoenomenon on the minds of the the failors; and, on their relating the circumstances when they arrived in port, the story spread like wildfire, and the fupposed phantom was called the Flying Dutchman. From the Dutch the English seamen got the infatuation, and there are very few Indiamen but what has some one on board who pretends to have feen the apparition.

About two in the morning I was waked by a violent shake by the shoulder, when starting up in my hammock, I saw the boatswain, with evident signs of terror and dismay in his countenance, standing by me. "For God's sake, messimate,"—said he—"hand us the key of the case, for by the Lord I'm damnably scarified: for, d'ye see, as I was just looking over the weather bow, what should I see but the Flying Dutchman coming right down upon us, with every thing set—I know 'twas she—I cou'd see all her lower-deck ports up, and the lights fore and aft, as if cleared for action. Now as how, d'ye see, I am sure no mortal ship could bear her lower-deck ports up and not founder in this here weather: Why, the sea runs mountains high. It must certainly be the ghost of that there Dutchman, that soundered in this latitude, and which, I have heard fay, always appears in this here quarter, in hard gales of wind.

After taking a good pull or two at the Holland's he grew a little composed, when I jokingly asked him, if he was astaid of ghosts? "Why, as to that, d'ye see,"—faid he—"I think as how I'm as good as another man; but I'd always a terrible antipathy to those things. Even when I was a boy, I never could find it in my heart to cross a church-yard in the dark without whisling and hallooing, to make them believe I had company with men for I've heard say they appear but to one at a time; for how, when I called to Joe Jackson, who was at the helm, to look over the weather bow, he saw nothing; tho', as how, I saw it as plain as this here bottle," taking another swig at the Geneva.

Having some curiosity to see if I could make out any thing that could take such an appearance, I turned out, and accompanied him upon deck; but it had cleared up, the moon shining very bright, and not a cloud to be seen; though, by what I could learn from the rest of the people who were on deck, it had been very cloudy about half an hour before, of course I easily divined what kind of phantom had so alarmed my messate. The sea running very high, and the gale rather increasing, we continued to lay too, and in the morning found we had parted company with the rest of the transports, not one being discernable from the mast head:

The wind abating in the afternoon, and coming to the north-west, we bore away under a reefed foresail: and it continuing to blow a very strong gale, we jogged on in F 2

this manner about ten days, when the weather moderateing we crouded all the fail we could make from this time till we made Van Dieman's land, off which we frequently faw in the night the fea covered with luminous spots, resembling lights floating on the surface, and I immediately imagined that it might have been some of these which the boatswain had seen through a passing cloud, and which he magnified into lanterns on a ship's lower deck, as in some points of view they had very much that appearance.

Whether these shining spots proceed from the spawn of fish floating in small quantities, or from an animal of a jelly-like substance, called by the failors, Blubber, is not determined, though I am of the latter opinion; vast shoals of them surrounded the ship in the course of the day. Numbers of sea birds now hovered over us, such as Albatrosses; Gulls of various species; and a large black bird, greatly resembling a crow, but rather bigger. In the evening the horizon was beautifully illumined by the Aurora Austrealis, or Southern Lights: they were of a bright crimson, variegated with orange, yellow and white streaks, continually changing their hues, and presented a most substitute surrounded the surrounded surrounded the surrounded surrounded the surrounded surrounded the surrounded surrounde

The next morning at day-break the man at the mast head cried out, "Land, hoa!" which agreeable sound re-echoed through the ship; and it clearing up we sound ourselves close in with it. We failed along the coast for some leagues, in the course of which we saw some pretty deep bays. We now stretched off in order to get a good offing, and to weather some rocks about three leagues from the shore, being afraid of passing too near them in the dark.

At day-light they appeared about fix miles on our lee-beam. Here we perceived a number of Seals playing and sporting alongside: they were in general of the fize of a common dog, with a long head, tapered to the nose like a greyhound; they frequently raised themselves half the length of their body out of the water, turning round as it were to reconnoitre, and sometimes in their gambols leaped entirely out. We took our leave of these sportive gentry, and, shaping our course for New Holland, before sunset lost sight of the land.

FAVOURABLE flant of wind, enabled us to make the land of New South Wales on the 12th of October, about eight leagues diffant.—We flood on till we were within about fix or feven miles from the fhore, and then ranged along the coast pleasantly.—At noon we were abreast of a point of land, called red point, only ten leagues distant from Botany Bay —About two leagues to the southward of the Bay is a chain of chalky hills, over-topped by level land.—On this land is a clump of trees something like Postdown-hill in the neighbourhood of Portsmouth. The wind springing up to the eastward, we stood from the land, under an easy sail, till daylight, when we were quite abreast of the bay; and, at noon, on the 13th. came to an anchor in Port Jackson, about five or fix leagues to the northward of it,

At ten o'clock the next morning the convicts were all ordered on fhore; their appearance was truly deplorable, the generality of them being emaciated by disease, and those who laboured under no bodily disorder, from the scantiness of their allowance, were in better plight. The boats from all the ships in the harbour attended in order to land them, there were in all two hundred and fifty men, six women, and a convict's wise and child who had obtained permission to accompany her husband.—We lost, during the voyage thirty two men.—Upon their landing they were entirely new cloathed from the king's store, and their old things were all burnt, in order to prevent any insectious disorder that might have been in the ship, from being introduced into the colony.

From the report of the captain I had a most gracious reception from the governor, he told me that on account of my behaviour on board, he would place me in a situation that should render my exile from England as little inksome as possible, and that if I continued to deserve it I might rely on his favour and protection: for the present I might return on board, and as soon as any boat could be spared from the ship, it should convey me and what things I had up to Parramatta, where a habitation should be provided for me. The next morning I received orders again to attend the governor at Sidney Cove, and to put my property in charge of a serjeant of Marines, who came off in a large boat, and who was to see it safely lodged in the public store, till such time as I should be settled, and able to take care of it myself.

I took leave of my messmates with unseigned regret, the captain himself accompanied me on shore, and waited on the governor with me.—His excellency said he had long wanted a proper person as superintendant of the convicts at Parramatta, that he had appointed me to that office, and that I should take charge of the farm-house there.—When I was dismissed, the serjeant took me to his house where I partook of a good sish dinner; and, it being some time before we could set off for my suture residence, we took a walk round the Cove, where some considerable buildings have been erected, for the governor, the lieutenant-governor, the judge-advocate and the greatest part of the officers.

The governor's house is of stone, near seventy feet in front, and makes a very handsome appearance. houses of the officers are of brick, the rest are generally log houses, plastered; the roofs are either shingled or thatched. Here is also an hospital, a good temporary building, and also barracks for the soldiers, and comfortable cabbins for the officers, with gardens adjoining; but unluckily these gardens are not very productive, as the foil is very indifferent; and to this inconvenience musthe added the depredations of rats and thieves. A mile or two from the Cove, the foil is confiderably better, where the officers and others have little farms; there are also brickilns, and a pottery, both of which articles they would bring to tolerable perfection, where they pofsessed of the materials used to glaze their earthen-ware. I wonder there are not more stone buildings here, stone, resembling that of Portland, being at hand in great abundance, exceedingly foft, but hardens very much after it is wrought, and exposed to the weather.

Not being able to proceed 'till the morning, I flung my cot in a corner of the ferjeant's house, and spent the evening with him; we role at day break, and, re-embarking my effects, left Sydney Cove about eight o'clock in the morning, and arrived at Parramatta about noon. Two or three miles before you come to the town, the river is quite narrow, not more than six or eight yards across, and the banks so high that you can scarce see the face of the country.—Where they were lower it had very much the appearance of a park or a gentleman's pleasure ground. In our progress we saw several Kangaroos but had a very impersect glance of them; the grass being long, entirely hid them from our view except when they were in the act of leaping.

We landed about a quarter of a mile from the town and walked up to it; it is fituated on an elevated fpot in the form of a crescent; a strong redoubt is constructed where there are very good barracks for a detachment of the military, which is always on duty here; as well to preferve good order and regularity among the convicts, as a check upon the natives, who from the distance to Sydney Cove might be tempted to molest the settlers, were there no armed force to protect them; they have little apprehenfion from the natives as they have never shewn any inclination to attack armed men; not that they are deflitute of courage, but that they are perfectly convinced of the great and invincible superiority of our fire-arms. After a fhort walk we arrived at the house appropriated for me, it is a compact little cottage with four rooms in it; the fituation is most delightful, being in the midit of pleasant gardens-the convict's houses form a line in front? at some distance, they have each a small garden and those who have been industrious seem very comfortable, as their day's work is not so hard, as many working men's in England.

A fervant who kept the house gave us some refreshment, after which I waited on the commanding officer of the troops, on duty here, and presented a letter given me by the governor; my reception was as agreeable as I could expect, he told me that the next day he would cause the convicts to be mustered in my presence, and inform them of my situation, as superintendant, and would then give me some instructions necessary to regulate my suture proceedings.

A general muster of the convicts—They are made acquainted with my situation among them—Their behaviour—Avocations—Hours of labour—Attend public worship—Get perfectly acquainted with my duty—Singular imposture of one of the convicts—Encouragement given to the convicts to become settlers on the expiration of their sentence—Description of the Kangaroo and of the native Dog—Get acquainted with the natives—Description of them—Their weapons—Manner of painting themselves when going to battle.

IN the morning a general muster took place; when A the whole were affembled, to the amount of near four hundred; they were informed by the officer of the trust the governor had been pleased to repose in me, and that any misbehaviour or disobedience of orders issuing from me would be as feverely punished as though they proceeded from the governor himself: they were then dismissed to their feveral employments. I proceeded through the different gangs of people at their respective occupations; and found them much more attentive to their business and respectful to those over them than I could possibly have imagined. Some were employed in making bricks and tiles; others, building store-houses, huts, &c. a great number clearing the grounds, bringing in timber, and making roads. Others at their different callings, fuch as fmiths, gardeners, coopers, shoemakers, taylors, bakers, attendants on the fick, &c. The hours of work are from fun-rise till half-past seven, when they breakfast; at half G 2 past past eight they resume their work 'till half past eleven, when they are rung to dinner; at two they recommence their labours, and the fetting of the fun is the fignal that terminates their daily toil, and which is announced by the drum beating a retreat. In order to encourage the cultivation of gardens, Saturday is appropriated to clear away and cultivate spots of ground for themselves; and those who have been industrious now find the benefit, by having plenty of vegetables, which faves their falt provisions, and enables them to truck with the natives for fish. Independent of this advantage, those who rear the greatest quantities of vegetables and plants receive premiums from the governor, who, at the proper feafon of the year, diftributes feeds among them for that purpose. The women fweep round the huts every morning, and cook the victuals for the men, collect all their dirty cloaths, and return each man his respective linen, washed and mended, on the Sunday morning.

No person is excused from attending divine worship, which is personned every Sunday morning at eleven o'clock, when all the convicts are obliged to attend in clean linen, and, indeed, behave in a more orderly and devout manner than would be naturally expected: indeed, the indefatigable zeal and wise measures pursued by the worthy governor in the formation of this infant colony is beyond all praise.

I had fome apprehensions that from my former situation in life I should have been exposed to many mortifications, although shielded by the protection of my office; but I saw sew faces who recollected me, and those who did behaved in the most respectful manner. The greater part of those who came over with me were sent to Norfolk Island, and those that were less remained at Syndey Cove.

My business was chiefly to report the progress made in the different works carrying on at Paramatta; for which purpose I was furnished with abstracts from a kind of overseers or head man of the various gangs; and in less than a week I was as much at home, and as perfectly master of the business, as though I had been coeval with the colony.

From a necessary and well regulated discipline, the convicts who had come over in the first ships had been brought into the excellent order above described; but many severe examples were made ere they were reduced to order, and various knaveries and tricks played on the officers; but punishment never failed to attend the detection of their frauds. In the infancy of the settlement a convict had industriously spread a report that he had discovered a gold mine, which at first gained credit, as the ore pretended to have been found had something of the appearance of gold ore.

The circumstance was as follows: One Dailey, a convict, had, he pretended, discovered a piece of ground which contained a considerable quantity of gold ore, some of which was produced, tried, and sound to contain a small portion of gold. The governor was absent at this time on an excursion into the country: the report coming to the ears of the lieutenant-governor, he examined the pretended discoverer, who told his story with the greatest plausibility, and it was not doubted but an important discovery had been made. Dailey was interfogated as to the place, but refused to give the necessary Information 'till the return of the governor, to whom he would give a full and fatisfactory account of the difcovery, on a promise that he would grant him what he should think equivalent to the importance of the discovery, and which he (Dailey) conceived a small compensation for fo valuable an acquifition: the demand was, his own and a particular woman convict's enlargement, and a paffage in one of the first ships to England, together with a fum of money. The lieutenant-governor told him, that unless he pointed out the spot he should consider him as an impostor, and order him to instant punishment, for daring to impose upon those officers to whom he had related the business. The dread of punishment disposed him to come too a little, though not without apparent reluctance: he proposed to the lieutenant-governor that an officer should be sent down the harbour with him, for the treasure, he said, lay in the lower part of the harbour, and near the fea shore; and he would shew the officer the exact foot: accordingly he was taken at his word, and an officer, with a corporal, and two or three foldiers, were fent with him; he pointed out the landing-place, whence he faid it was but a fhort walk to the defired fpot. They entered the wood, but had scarce got among the bushes, which were very thick, than he begged leave to turn afide as though he had a preffing occasion; this was granted him: the officer continued waiting for him, but to no purpose; for as soon as he had got out of their reach he pushed off towards Sydney Cove by land, leaving the officer and his foldiers to beat their heels, and curfe their credulity in letting him out of their fight.

The officer having dispatched the boat back on their landing, intending to return on foot, was left in no very enviable fituation. Mr. Dailey reached Sydney in the afternoon, and informed the lieutenant-governor that he had left those whom he had sent down with him in entire possession of the gold mine; he then got a few things from his own tent, and disappeared. The party, after searching some hours after the cheat, marched round to the camp, where they arrived at dusk, heartily tired, and not a little chagrined at the trick the villain had put upon them.

The want of provisions soon brought the discoverer back to the settlement, and a severe slogging was the reward of his ingenuity; however he still persisted in having made the discovery which he before had mentioned, and his reason for quitting the officer who went with him was, that he was sure if he made the discovery to the governor himself he should certainly get what he had demanded.

When the governor returned he was made acquainted with the business, and another officer was sent with him, although there was not a person in the colony who had the least faith in his affertions. The officer who now accompanied him informed him, on landing from the boat, that if he offered to quit him for an instant he would put him to death. This determination so terrified the gold-finder, that he acknowledged the imposture: he was then interrogated respecting the ore which he had produced. He confessed he had filed down part of a yellow metal buckle, and had mixed it with some gold filings from a broken ring, which he had got from one of the convict women, all which he had blended with some earth, and made it hard. The man who tried the ore had been a filver-smith, and on separating the different parts he discovered a small quantity of gold contained therein: the cheat received a second punishment for his perseverance, and a recommendation to be very attentive to his duty, and not attempt any more tricks as he valued his neck.

Having a good deal of time on my hands, my attendance and inspection being generally finished in the forenoon, I frequently vifited the farms of the fettlers: thefe in general were convicts whose term of transportation had expired, and had had lands granted them, in the following proportions: thirty acres to every fingle man; fifty to the married ones; and ten more for every child: they received provisions and cloathing from the public flores for the first eighteen months: the necessary tools and implements of husbandry, with seeds and grain to fow the ground the first year: two young fow pigs were also given to each fettler, and a pair or two of fowls. On those conditions twenty-seven of them had commenced farming in the neighbourhood of Parramatta, Profpect-Hill, and at fome ponds about two miles to the northward. At this time these settlements had little the appearance of farms; but as there were many very induftrious and careful men among them, their flock foon began to thrive, and the face of the country show evident figns of culture.

In my walks I often fell in with the Kangaroos, of which there are great numbers: they are about the fize of a common deer, of a dark tan colour; its head, I think, refembles that of the Mocock from the East Indies.

The hind legs are much longer than the fore, and with them they leap and fpring forward with amazing rapidity, their fore feet feldom being feen to touch the ground; and, indeed, they are fo very fhort, that it is not possible the animal can make great use of them in running: they have prodigious force in their tail, which is a principal part of their defence when attacked; they ftrike a blow with this weapon fufficient to break the leg of a man, or the back of dog; it also affists them in their fprings, which are truly furprizing. The native Dog is much fwifter than the Kangaroo, and will attack them with great courage; the chafe is feldom of long duration, the Kangaroo being foon tired, and is generally overtaken in less than a quarter of an hour. When seized, if they have no opportunity of using the tail to advantage, they turn upon the Dog, and catching hold with the talons of his fore-paws, he flys at and strikes his adversary with those of his hind-feet, which are long, sharp, and of great firength; and, if the dog is not affifted, it frequently bappens that they get the better.

I have frequently feen male Kangaroo's which, when fitting on their haunches, would measure at least from five feet eight to five feet ten inches in height; such an one would, I think, over-match any of the dogs; but I never ventured to try them fingly. Having had feveral young native dogs given me, from time to time, I take great delight in Kangaroo hunting; it is not only an agreeable exercise, but produces a dish for the table, nearly as good as mutton; and, in the present dearth of live stock, is not an unacceptable present.

The

The Native Dog greatly refembles the Pomeraniant breed: with their ears erect, they have a remarkable favage look, and are not unlike a Wolf, both in fize and appearance. There is no getting the better of their natural ferocity; for if you take ever fuch pains in rearing them, they will, at every opportunity, deftroy the Sheep, Pigs, or Poultry, nor do I think it possible to break them of this savageness of temper, so that they are of little or no use, except in hunting the Kangaroo.

I had many opportunities of getting acquainted with feveral of the natives; and, as I feldom faw them without giving them fome trifle or other, foon became a great favourite with them, and mostly had one or other of them with me in my rambles. The men in general are from five feet fix to five feet nine inches high; are rather flender, but ffraight, and well made. The women are not quite fo tall, rather luftier, but are mostly well made. Their colour is a brownish black, of a coffee cast, but many of the women are almost as light as a mulatto: now and then you may meet with some of both sexes with pretty tolerable features, but broad nofes, wide mouths, and thick lips, are most generally met with; their countenances are not the most preposfessing, and what renders them still less to, is, they are abominably filthy. They know no fuch ceremony as washing themselves; and their Ikin is mostly smeared with the fat of such animals as they kill, and afterwards covered with every fort of dirt; fand from the beach, and ashes from their fires, all adhere to their filthy skin, which never comes off, except when accident, or the want of food obliges them to go into the water. Some of the men wear a piece of wood, or bone thrust through the septum of the nose, which, by raifing raising the opposite sides of the nose, dilates the nostril, and spreads the lower part very much. Many of them want the two front teeth on the right fide of the upper jaw; and I have feen feveral of the women who have loft the two first joints of the little finger of the left hand, a circumstance which I have never been able to discover the meaning of. This want of the little finger I observed in elderly women; in girls, of eight or nine years old; in young women, who have had children; and in those who have had none. I have also observed that the finger has been perfect in individuals of all ages and defcriptions. They have, in general, good teeth; their hair is fhort, ftrong, and curly; and they having no method of combing or cleaning it, it is always filthy and matted: the men's beards are short and curly like the hair of their heads. They all go entirely naked, men, women, and children, and feem to have no fixed place of refidence. but lay down wherever night overtakes them. Cavities in the rocks on the fea fhore, are places they usually feek to shelter themselves from the wind and rain; and they mostly make a good fire before they go to sleep, by which means the rock round them becomes heated, and retains its warmth a confiderable time, like an oven; and spreading a little dried grafs they lie down and huddle together.

The men are generally armed with a lance, and a short stick which they use in throwing it; this stick is about a yard long, slat on one side, and a notch in one end, the other is surnished with a slat shell sixed into a split in the stick, made sast with a strong gum, which, when dry, is as hard as slint: on the slat side of the stick they place the lance, the butt end of which rests against the notch in the throwing stick; possing the lance thus fixed in one hand, binding it with the fore finger and thumb to prevent its slipping off; keeping fast hold of the throwing stick, they hurl the lance with considerable force, and tolerably true, to the distance of seventy or eighty yards. Their lances are in general about ten feet long; the shell fixed on the throwing stick is intended for sharpening the point of their lance, and various other uses. Although they throw their lances with considerable velocity, I should think it no very difficult matter, being on one's guard, either to parry or get out of the way of them.

When they are upon any hostile expedition, they paint their faces and bodies with red and white streaks, as if they intended to firike terror by their death-like appearance: fome are mere lines drawn without attention or method; others with the greatest nicety and exactness. At a few paces distance some have the appearance of being accoutered with crofs-belts: others, with white circles round their eyes, and feveral horizontal lines across the forehead; others, again, have narrow white lines across the body, with a broad streak down the middle of the back and belly, and a fingle line down the arm, thigh, and leg. Being commonly marked with white, their black skins are feen very conspicuously between the lines, and, at a fhort distance, takes very much the appearance of a skeleton, and which, I suppose, is what they intend to reprefent. The colours they use are chiefly red and white, the first of which is a kind of Ochre, or red earth, which is found here in abundance; the latter is a fine Pipe Clay, great quantities of which are used in the potteries established in the colony. The bodies of the men are much scarified, particularly about the breast and shoulders; and although not very regular, yet are confidered as ornamental.

Campaigns generally settled by negociation—Their habitations—Wonderful dexterity in climbing the Cabbage and Palm trees—Their method of hunting small animals—Description of various Quadrupeds—Curious similarity of the different species—Fish—Birds—Insects—Plants and fruits.

HE warriors thus armed and painted range themfelves in a line, with each a green bough in their hand, as a token that they do not mean to use force, unless obliged thereto, in their own defence, or in case their difference cannot be settled by an amicable agreement: a long parley generally ensues, and concessions on both sides for the most part terminate their bloodless campaign.

Building themselves habitations never seem to have entered their imaginations, or any place to shelter them from the weather, though they have plenty of the most inclement; their indo ence and want of foresight in this particular would be fatal to them, were it not for the liberal hand of nature, who has so abundantly supplied the sea shores with soft crumbly rocks, which, for the most part, are excavated by the washing of the sea, so as to form caves of very considerable dimensions; sometimes sifty or more of them find a comfortable lodging in one of these caves. In the woods where there are no rocks, they strip the bark off several trees, and cutting them into slips, sasten and enterlace them to four stakes drove in the ground, bending broad pieces of the bark over the top to shelve off the rain; these commonly hold a family; and, as the weather is very cold in the winter months, they find it necessary to huddle very close for the benefit of the warmth to which each individual mutually contributes a share. These huts are only used when they are out a Kangaroo hunting; for in that season they employ themselves wholly in the woods.

Most of the large trees are hollow, by decaying at the heart; and when the Opossum, Kangaroo, Rat, Squirrel, and various other animals which inhabit the woods, are purfued, they commonly take shelter in these trees. order, therefore, to make fure of them, wherein they feldom fail, when they find them in the tree, one man climbs to the top, which is performed with wonderful dexterity, in the following manner: they cut notches in the bark about an inch deep, which is a kind of rest for the ball of the great toe; the two first notches are cut before they begin to climb, the rest as they ascend, at such diftances from each other, that when both feet are in the notches, the right is raifed nearly as high as the middle of the left thigh; when they are raifing themselves the hatchet is held in their mouths, that they may have the use of both their hands; and when making the notch the body rests on the ball of the great toe; the fingers of the left hand are also placed in a notch cut on the fide of the tree, should it be too large to admit their clasping it sufficiently with the left arm to keep their body firm and close to it. In this manner they afcend, with wonderful agility, trees fifteen or twenty feet in circumference, fometimes fixty or feventy feet before they come to a fingle branch.

Being arrived at the top, or the place he judges the most convenient, he takes his seat with his club or stick in his hand, another person below makes a fire and fills the hollow trunk with smoak, which obliges the animal to attempt its escape, either upwards or downwards, but whichever way it takes, it is almost certain of destruction, as they very seldom escape. In this manner they employ themselves, and get a livelihood in the woods. They, sometimes, when many of them are hunting together, set fire to the country for several miles in extent; this is for the purpose of disturbing such animals as may be within the circle of the constagration: thus the affrighted animals, consounded, singed, and half-smothered, fall an easy prey to their persevering and sanguinary adversaries.

These fires, it is supposed, are sometimes intended to clear that part of the country through which they have occasion to travel, of the briars and thorns, from which, being naked, they fuffer great inconvenience. The fires which are frequently feen in the fummer time account also for an appearance which very much puzzled the first settlers; this was, that more than two thirds of the trees in the woods were very much fcorched with fire, fome were burnt quite black to the very top; the cause of this occasioned great difference of opinion, but it is now evident that it was occasioned by the fires which the natives fo frequently make, and which often reach the highest branches of the trees; Lat first conjectured it to be the effect of lightning, but upon examining farther, it appeared too general to have been caused by such an accident.

Opossums are very numerous here: they partake a good deal of the Kangaroo, in the strength of their tail, and make of its fore legs, which are very fhort in proportion to the hinder ones; like that animal it is provided with a false belly for the safety of its young in time of danger, and its colour very much refembles that of the common English Rat; it is of the fize of a small Cat, and very inoffensive. There are a variety of other animals of different fizes, from the Opposium down to our implacable enemy, the Field Rat, all of which, in some shape or other, partake of the Kangaroo and Opposium. I have caught feveral Rats with their pouch full of young ones, formed exactly in their legs, claws, and tail, as the above animals. One would almost conclude, from the great refemblence of the different quadrupeds found here, that there is a promiscuous intercourse between the different fexes of all those various animals. This strange similarity does not attach folely to quadrupeds, for the finny inhabitants of the fea are in the fame predicament, their variety is truly aftonishing; most of them partake in some degree of the thark, and it is no uncommon thing to fee the head and shoulders of a Skait to the hind part of a Shark, or a Shark's head to the body of a large Mullet, and what is more aftonishing, sometimes to the flat body of a Sting Ray or Holibet.

Nature feems equally playful in the feathered tribe: the Parrot is the most common. I have shot several, with the head, neck, and bill of the Parrot, and with the same beautiful plumage on those parts for which that bird here is distinguished; a tail and body of a different make and colour, with long delicate feet and legs, which is quite the reverse of the Parrot kind. There is also a bird with the feet and legs of a Parrot, whose head, neck, make, and colour, were like the common Sea Gull, with the wings and tail of the Hawk. Neither is this confined to the animal creation; for here are trees bearing three different forts of leaves; others bearing the leaf of the gum tree, with the gum exuding from it, and covered with bark of a very different kind.

The country abounds in birds of numberless species: those of the Parrot kind, such as the Macaw, Cocatoo, Lory, Green Parrot, and Paroquets of different species and sizes, are ornamented with the most gay and luxuriant plumage that can be conceived. The common crow is no stranger here, but is found in considerable numbers; the sound of their voice and manner of croaking is widely different from those in Europe. Hawks are in great plenty; Pidgeons, Quails, and a great variety of small birds; but I have not seen any with an agreeable note.

There is also a very large bird, but it is not very common; at first they were taken for the Ostrich, as they did not fly when pursued, but ran so exceedingly fast that a strong Native Dog could not overtake them: I shot one of them, which measured upwards of two yards and a half from its feet to the upper part of its head. The difference between this bird and the Ostrich is in its bill, which is narrower at the point, and it has three toes, which is not the case with the Ostrich, as I had an opportunity of seeing several of them at the Cape. It possesses one singularity by which it cannot fail of being known, which is, that two distinct feathers grow out from every quill. Its sless, though not the most tender grained, is far from unacceptable: it resembles, when raw, neck beef; and a fide-bone of this bird makes an excellent dinner for half a dozen. The crow, I think, relishes equally as well here as the barn fowl in England. I have fometimes, when on a shooting excursion, fallen in with the Black Swan: the extremity of their wings are white, and all the rest of their plumage a bright black; its bill, a pale pink, or crimson: they are of the size of the common White Swan, and are a delicate appendage to the table.

A predigious quantity of Bats have made their appearance during these two last years; they are generally seen about Rose-Hill towards the close of the evening: the head of this Bat very much resembles that of the Fox; the wings of many of them extend four feet from tip to tip. I have one of them that will eat out of the hand, and is as domestic in the house as a Cat. Their smell is rank and offensive; and numbers having perished from the extreme heat of the weather, and fallen into the water about Rose-Hill, rendered it undrinkable for some days.

There are as many different species of infects as of birds; the Centipedes Spider Ant, and Scorpion; the generality of these vary but little from those described as inhabitants of most parts between the tropicks: the Ant possesses not only the greatest portion of industry, but also of courage; an insult is never offered them with impunity: they are of various sizes, from the common European Ant to near three quarters of an inch in length, they are also of different colours, as black, white, yellow, and red; the most formidable of which are the red-coated gentry: whenever it happens that that they are disturbed by any person or beast treading on their nests, which are constructed just beneath the surface, with numberless small passages, or outlets, they sally forth in myriads and attack the ill sated and unconscious offender with astonishing intrepidity, and even continue their pursuit to a considerable distance; their bite, if not venomous, is attended with the most acute pain for some time; one species of them build their nests against a tree, of the size of a bee-hive; another kind raises mounts of earth with prodigious industry to the height of sour feet.

The Spider of this country nearly approaches the Ant in point of industry; the smallest of these are larger than any I ever saw in England; they spread their web in the woods between the trees, generally to the distance of ten or a dozen yards, and weave them so strong that small birds are frequently entangled therein. The silk of which the web is composed, when wound off in a ball I think is equal to any I ever saw in the same state from the silk worm; it is of the same colour, a pale yellow, or straw colour; of Reptiles, there are Snakes from the smallest I have ever seen in England to the length of eleven seet, and as thick as a man's leg; also lizards of various kinds and sizes.

A great variety of beautiful plants and flowers abound in this country; but being unacquainted with the science of Botany I am consequently unqualified to descant on their different properties; we find wild spinach, parsley and forrel, but not in sufficient quantities to flatter ourselves with the hope of deriving any considerable advantage to the colony therefrom.

Exclusive

Exclusive of the Plantain, Banana, and other tropical fruits, here are some peculiar I believe to this country; that which they call the Mizzabore greatly refembles our cherry, its tafte is very infipid, and it varies but little from another fruit, fimilar in its appearance, but fomething finaller, and which is also found in abundance; there is also a third fort, which also resembles the former two; though there is fo great a fimilarity between these fruits it is remarkable that the trees which bear them are of very different kinds and appearance. - These berries have all the same insipidity and are held in no estimation by our people; but there is another berry, of about the fize of a currant, and grows on a tree the leaves of which are much like the broom: the juice of this fruit, when ripe is, perhaps, the pureft acid in the world; it is extremely pleafant to the taffe, and by the faculty held in great estimation as a most powerful antiscorbutic-It is an excellent acquifition in making tarts, jellies and other delicacies in the confectionary and pastry department. There is another species of berries, which when ripe, is a clear red, of the fize of a current, and shaped like a heart; it has a most pleasant flavour, is a strong astringent, and if not taken in too great quantities is not unwholfome, many of the people having eaten of them yery freely without any pernicious consequence.

Here is also a Nut which acts as a violent purgative, and emetic, if eaten unprepared: it must be soaked seven or eight days in water, taking care that the water be changed every day.—When it has been thoroughly soaked, it is then roassed in the embers; and when done it is not unlike a chesnut, and very palatable.

BOUT a twelvemonth before my arrival, the Small-Pox made its appearance and occasioned a terrible havock among the poor natives. It was truly shocking to find the coves of the harbour, which were formerly thronged with numerous families in tempestuous weather, now ftrewed with the dead bodies of men, women and children. No vestige of this cruel disorder being visible in the countenances of any of the natives, it was reafonable to suppose they were never before infected with it, and of course ignorant of the method of treating this cruel ravager of the human species. The various attitudes in which the dead bodies were found, afforded reason to believe that when any of them were indisposed, and the diforder assumed the appearance of the small-pox, they were immediately deferted by their friends and left to perish, in their helpless situation, for want of sustenance. Some have been found fitting with their heads reclined between their knees; others were leaning against a rock, a rock, with their head resting upon it. Two children, a boy and a girl, the boy about nine, the girl about two years older, were picked up during the prevalence of this disorder, labouring under its dreadful effects. Two old men, who were supposed the fathers of the children were picked up about the same time, and carried to the hospital, where they were taken all possible care of; the men survived but a short time, but the children both recovered, and appeared perfectly satisfied with their change of living.

About this time a native, who I saw frequently at the governor's and who was now as perfectly at his ease in company as if he had been bred in England, being decently cloathed, and managing his knife, fork, cup and faucer with great dexterity, was entrapped from his friends. Some officers were fent down the harbour with two boats for the purpose of feizing any of the natives they could lay their hands on; the governor having found that no encouragement would induce them to pay a vifit to the colony of their own accord: he therefore determined to get some of them into his possession, and by kind treatment prevail on them to bring their countrymen to repose more confidence in us-Arabanoo, the name of the native above alluded to was taken in the following manner

Being enticed near to the beach, by the display of various articles calculated to excite his curiofity and defire, and builly employed in admitting the prefents that were given him, one of the feamen, stationed for the purpose, threw a rope round his neck, and, in a moment dragged him to the boat; his cries brought a number of his friends to the skirts of the wood, from whence they threw feveral spears but without effect. To pourtray the terror and difmay depicted in the countenance of this poor creature, would require the hand of an able artist: he believed he was to be put to instant death; but when he was affured by the officers that his life was fafe, and they at the same time casting off the rope they had bound round his neck and fixing it to his leg, treated him with fo much kindness that he gradually became cheerful. On his arrival at the governor's house he had an iron shackle put round his leg to prevent the possibility of an escape; this he was taught to confider as a Bang Ally, a term in their language, used for a decoration of any kind; and it was no very difficult matter to bring him into the belief of this, as it was not uncommon to fee fome of the convicts ironed in the fame manner, as a punishment for the crimes they had committed in the colony.

Arabanoo, from the kind treatment he experienced, was foon reconciled to his fituation, and the iron becoming troublesome, galling his leg, it was taken off, and he was permitted to go where he pleased. The names of the different gentlemen who took notice of him were soon familiar to him, and he could call them with great facility—He was a very good tempered sellow, of about thirty years of age, well made, and on the whole not an unhandsome figure.

The intentions of the governor was however fruftrated for a time, poor Arabanco, ere he could bring about about a good understanding with his countrymen, was attacked with the Small-Pox, which notwithstanding every possible means was used by the faculty for his recovery, he only lived till the criss of his distemper.

Frequent indications of hostilities, as well as the missing of several of the convicts, who were supposed to have been murdered by the natives, made the governor exceedingly regret the fate of poor Ara-banoo, who, had he lived, might have prevented much of this hostile disposition towards us, as he would soon have understood enough of our language to have communicated whatever we defired; he could have made them understand that we wished to live with them on the most friendly sooting, and to promote, as much as in our power, their comfort and happiness.

The children had recovered from the small pox, and were perfectly happy in their situation, but were then too young to be of service in reconciling their cuntrymen to us; they very soon understood almost every thing that was said, and could also make themselves tolerably well understood; but the governor was still determined, if possible, to get a man or two into his possession, who might be taught enough of the language to render them useful negociators.

Accordingly some officers and a party of men were fent on this expedition, in an armed boat; they proceeded to the north side of the harbour, where they faw two of the natives walking on the beach: a plan was soon formed to entice them to conversation; a few large fish were held up, and an officer who spoke fome words of their tongue, hailed them, which had the defired effect. The men advanced, unarmed, with much confidence, and readily took the fifth that was presented them. The boat was lying affoat, and five or fix feamen on the beach, nearly furrounding them: when the officer in the boat, observing the opportunity favourable, made the fignal to fecure them; in an inftant they were tripped up, and tumbled into the boat, ere they had time to look around. They called out to their friends the moment they recovered their recollection, and a confiderable number appeared from the woods, and many spears were thrown, one of which pierced through the gunwale of the boat: the party pulled off instantly, and the people presenting their fire-arms, they halted, not daring to venture any farther attack. The two prisoners were made fast to the thwarts of the boat on being put on board; but having got a good distance from the shore, their hands were loofed, and they were only fecured by one leg. When they were landed at Sydney Cove, the refidence of the governor, many people, prompted by curiofity, went to fee them; among whom were Arabaroo, and Nanbarre, the two children before mentioned: the moment they faw them their eyes sparkled with joy; they called them by their names; the children were also known to them; and by their easy and apparently fatisfied behaviour tended greatly to calm their apprehentions.

They discovered that one of the men they had taken was a chief of the tribe of Cadigal, named Coalby; he was about thirty-five years of age: the other, about about twenty-five, was called Banalong: he was a fmart, active, good looking young man, of a lively, pleafant disposition. His fellow prisoner appeared a check upon the volatile temper of Banalong, who, in his presence, was always sedate and grave, and paid great deserence to him; but no sooner was Coalby out of sight, than all his gravity for sook him, and he was as merry and good humoured as though he had been all his life in the colony. They were treated with the utmost kindness; but least they should attempt an escape, they were each of them an iron on one leg, with a piece of rope spliced to it, and a man was ordered for each, who was to be responsible for their security. Wherever they went they were accompanied by their leaders, holding one end of the rope.

They had been taken near three weeks, when they appeared fo well fatisfied with their treatment, that their keepers began to be under very little apprehenfions of their attempting to get from them; this fecurity they did not fail to avail themselves of: accordingly one evening about dusk, their guards fitting within the door of their hut, eating their supper; Banalong being also in the hut in like manner employed: Coalby feated without the door, pretending to be also eating his supper, unspliced the rope from the fhackle, leaving the other end fast in the keeper's hand, who had not the least fuspicion of what was going forward: he was over the paling of the yard in an instant. The noise he made in leaping the paling roused those within, but too late; the fugitive gained the wood in spite of an immediate pursuit, and joined his friends. Banalong was much more cheerful after Coalby's

Coalby's departure, which confirmed the conjecture, and the children's report, that he was a chief, and confequently Banalong flood in great awe of him.

This man had feveral names; but the one he ufually went by was Banalong: he is a fout well made man, about five feet fix inches high; he is dark black, large featured, and has a flat nofe; his hair is the fame as the Africans, but very coarfe and strong; he is very good humoured, of a lively and pleafant disposition, and feldom angry at any jokes that are paffed on him: he readily imitates the actions and gestures of every person in the governor's family, and generally fits at table with the governor, whom he calls Beanga, or father, and he, in return, calls him Doorow, or fon : he is under no restraint, nor does he appear aukward in eating; and confidering the favage flate from which he has fo recently emerged, he may be deemed a polite man, as he performs the ceremonies of bowing, drinking healths, returning thanks, &c. with the most scrupulous exactness. He is very fond of wine, but cannot bear the fmell of spirits, although they have often tried to deceive him, by mixing very weak rum or brandy and water, and giving it him for wine and water, but he instantly discovers the deception, and is very angry on these occasions: he generally accompanies the governor in his walks, who, to inspire him with confidence, always takes off his small sword, and puts it on him, and he is much pleased at this mark of distinction. His dress is a jacket, made of coarse red kersey, and a pair of trowsers; but on Sundays he is dreffed in nankeen. The governor's reason for making him wear the thick kersey is that he may be so fenfible K 2 fenfible of cold as not to be able to go without cloaths. He fings when asked, but in general his songs are of the mournful strain; he keeps time by throwing his arms backward and forward. Whenever defired to dance, he does it with the utmost readiness; his geftures at first are very flow, and regulated by a low difmal tune, which quickens as the dance advances, 'till at length he throws himself into the most violent attitudes, shaking his arms, and striking the ground, with great force, which gives him the appearance of a madman. It is very probable that this part of the dance is used as a kind of defiance, as all the natives which were feen when the governor first landed at Port Jackson, always accompanied this fort of dance to their vociferations of "Woroo, Woroo!" " Go " away, Go away."

The kind treatment, and air of satisfaction which Banalong manifested for the space of a year after Coalby's slight, determined the governor to trust him with his liberty. Accordingly the shackle was taken from his leg, nor did he in the least seem disposed to leave the governor's house, or desert his new friends: he continued this behaviour with great success for several days, so that no person had the least suspicion of his leaving the colony; he, however, one evening, just as it was dark, stripped himself, and leaving the cloaths that had been given him behind, beat his march into the woods.

Both he and Coalby were frequently seen by the boats employed in fishing, and would even converse with the people, who earnestly invited them to return to Sydney; but no entreaties could prevail on them to accept the invitation.

The governor having received information that they were feen in a cove at the entrance of the harbour, he went thither, attended by feveral of the officers, but they were all unarmed, which ill-judged piece of confidence had like to have proved fatal to the governor. The particulars of this expedition were related to me nearly as follows:

The governor, with some of the gentlemen of the colony, went down to the mouth of the harbour, in order to pitch on a spot proper to erect a landmark, to enable strangers the more readily to ascertain the harbour's mouth when at sea; on their return they were met by a boat, which had just landed a party of officers, who intended to take a survey of the shore as far as Broken bay: the coxswain of the boat informed the governor, that one of the party (Mr. White, the surgeon) had seen Coalby and Banalong, and had had some conversation with them; that they enquired asserted every person they had any knowledge of in the colony, and particularly the governor, and that they said they would go up to Sydney if he would come for them.

In consequence of this information, his excellency returned to the Cove, got some sew presents for them, which he supposed would be acceptable; he also ordered sour musquets into the boat, and immediately repaired to the spot where these men had been seen. When they arrived at the place, they sound a number of the natives fitting round a fire, and near them lay the remains of a dead whale, which had been thrown ashore in a hard gale, and on which they had been heartily feafting. As foon as they were within hail, the governor flood up in the boat, and called for Banalong, and in their language asked where he was. Banalong instantly answered, "Here I am." His excellency then faid, "I am the governor, your father; which title he always gave the governor when he was at Sydney. After defiring two gentlemen to remain in the boat, and to have the musquets ready, upon examining which, two were found unprovided with flints, his excellency landed, and walked towards them with his arms extended, to flew them he was unarmed, and that they might be be under no apprehenfions for their fafety: they appeared very backward in coming to a nearer conference; however he continued approaching them till he entered the wood; one of them, possessed of more affurance than his comrades, after frequently repeating the words "Governor, father," ventured to shake hands in a friendly manner. His excellency then returned to the boat, and ordered one of the people to bring fome wine, beef, bread, and a jacket or two which had been brought on purpose, and returned to them with these prefents. On his shewing a bottle, one of them called out, "Wine I wine?" two of them immediately advanced, took the things, and drank a little of the wine; the governor also gave them two or three knives; he then returned to the boat, and told the gentlemen that remained in her that he had not feen either Coalby or Banalong, and that his mind was not altogether satisfied with regard to their pacific intentions;

tions; at the same time defiring them to flay by he boat, and give a good look, and be ready in case of alarm. He then went towards them, accompanied by captain Collins. The officer in the boat frequently heard one of the natives call to Banalong, and acquaint him with the observations he made upon those who were in the boat, which was kept affoat upon her oars; prefently after one of the people came down from the governor, and acquainted Mr. Waterhouse, the officer left in the boat, that both Coalby and Banalong were among them, had asked for him, and that governor Philip defired he would join them. He immediately accompanied the meffenger to the governor, whom he found, with captain Collins, in close converfation with two of the natives, who were unarmed: Mr. Waterhouse went up, but did not recognize Banalong till he was pointed out to him, fo much was he altered; nor could he then perfuade himfelf that it was the same. On the question being repeatedly asked, where was Banalong, he grew rather impatient, and was going off; however a bottle being shewn him, and being asked the name of it, he readily anfwered, "The king;" having observed, when at the governor's house, his majesty's health drank in the first glass after dinner, and had been taught to repeat the word before he drank his own glass, he imagined the liquor was called the king; and when he afterwards came to know it was wine, yet he would frequently call it king. This convinced the gentlemen that it was no other than their old acquaintance Banalong; and every method was tried to induce him to go down to the boat; but he always retired when any one approached nearer than he wished, fo that they gradually gradually got out of fight of the boat, when about a dozen of the natives placing themselves in a fituation" to prevent any furprize, Banalong and Coalby came among the gentlemen, and asked various questions relative to different transactions which had occurred at the fettlement during their refidence there. Banalong took Mr. Waterhouse round the neck, Coalby shook them all by the hand; a jacket being prefented to him he was puzzle how to put it on, and begged one of the gentlemen to do it for him: Banalong had a very fine fpear in his hand, which the governor asked him for, but he would not part with it. During all this time the most perfect harmony and friendship seemed to fubfift among the whole party; but the governor, perceiving upwards of twenty of them clofing round his party, proposed returning to the boat, telling Banalong that he would shortly return, and bring him and Coalby a couple of hatchets, which pleafed them extremely. The governor then went down to the beach. and the officers left in the boat came on shore; the boat's crew with the arms remained in the boat; as' the natives, by continuing their polition, indicated forne remaining fymptoms of diffrust, his excellency was afraid of alarming them. Banalong was very cheerful, and appeared transported at the fight of so many of his dear friends, as he termed them; inceffantly shaking hands all round. He pointed out a small fire near them, and faid he would fleep there till their return. They were very merry on their escape, and told them how Coalby got rid of the shackle by which he had been secured when at the settlement, and that if they had meant to keep them, they should never " Nangora,"-Fall afleep. The

The governor and his party now began to move to-wards the boat, when a flout native, who had been feen standing at a distance, approached; at first he shewed strong indications of fear, which soon subsided on his being treated in the same familiar friendly manner as Coalby and Banalong, and he became tolerably conversable. He shewed a wound which he had received in the back with a spear; this also put Banalong upon shewing that he had also been wounded in different parts of the body since he quitted the settlement; one was through the left arm, made with a spear; another dangerous one over the left eye, not healed: these wounds, he said, were received in a rencounter with a neighbouring tribe near Botany Bay.

The party fill proceeding towards the beach, were detained by Banalong, who continued teazing them about the hatchets that were to be fent him; and he pointed out the flout native, who had retired about thirty yards diffance, whom he appeared anxious should be noticed: the governor advanced towards him, and upon the savage indicating that he would not be approached, he laid down his sword, still going forward with extended arms, to assure him he was unarmed.

As the governor drew near, the native seized a speak that lay concealed in the grass, fixed it in his throwaing slick, and for some moments appeared to stand on his defence. There being not the least reason to suppose he would throw it without provocation, his examples.

cellency continued to advance, calling out "Weree, Weree," a term used by them when they wish a thing not to be done which displeases them: not withstanding which the native discharged the spear with surprizing velocity, and immediately ran off. In their setreat to the woods many spears were thrown, but the only one which took effect was unfortunately the first, which struck our much loved governor: it entered his right shoulder just above the collar bone, and came out behind, about three inches lower under the blade bone.

The gentlemen near the governor concluded he was mortally wounded, and feared, from the number of armed men that began to fhew themselves from the woods, that it would be impracticable for them to reach the boat. The governor, holding up the spear, which trailed on the ground, endeavoured to make his way to the beach, but its great length frequently stopped him; in this fituation he defired fome one to endeavour if poffible to draw the fpear out of his body, but it being barbed, it was found impracticable; they then with great difficulty broke it, and difembarraffed him from the greater part; he then drew a pistol from his pocket, and difcharged it at them, who, from the apprehension of there being more fire-arms among the party, kept a respectful distance; and the governor, carried between two of the people, reached the boat without any farther moleflation-

Immediately after their arrival at Sydney, the furgeon was fent for, Mr. Balmain, the first who arrived at the governor's house, after examining the wound, relieved every body from the most painful fufpenfe, by affuring them, that alarming as the fituation of the governor might appear, he did not apprehend any fatal consequences from it : he extracted the point of the spear, dressed the wound, and, to the admiration of every body, in fix weeks he was enabled to go about,

CHAP XIII.

A shooting party fall in with some of the natives, who give information of the man who speared the governor—Araboo wants to be married—Governor Phillip, has an interview with Banalong, and makes him some presents, Barangaroo his wife introduced—A second interview; Banalong prevailed on to wifit the settlement—Curious behaviour of his wife on the occasion, repeats his visit with several of the natives—Friendly intercourse with the natives established—Banalong's extraordinary behaviour to a native girl.

OVERNOR Philip still desirous of being re-Conciled with the natives, did not harbour any resentment towards them on account of the late transaction, which he construed to have proceeded from a sudden impulse of sear rather than treachery, and had given the necessary directions that none of them should be fired at, or any ways molested, unless they provoked it by the throwing of spears or other hostilities.

Nambarre, the boy, who had now become a tolerable interpreter, attending fome of the officers, who were on a shooting excursion, near the spot where the accident to the governor had happened, a number of natives appeared on an eminence at a short distance; being asked who it was that threw the spear at the governor, they named a man of the tribe who dwelt to the Northward; that his name was Carrigal. Nanbarre was also defired to enquire after Banalong and Coalby, Coalby, when they pointed to some people at a distance—One of whom threw a spear at an officer who asked for it; but evidently with no mischievous design, as he took care it fell where nobody was standing.

The girl Abaroo was in the boat, and pointing to one of the natives faid it was her father, and was very defirous of going with them; the had arrived at. an age when her inclination began to tend toward the other fex, and with great naiveté and innocence told the officers that she wanted to be married-As the had no oppportunity of a connection of that kind in the clergyman's house where she dwelt, and it would be a difficult matter to keep her against her will, it was judged most prudent to permit her to go where she pleased, and she was told that as soon as fome new cloaths could be made for her, she should take them with her, with which affurances she was perfectly fatisfied to flay fome time longer; during which great pains were taken to instruct her in English, that she might be enabled to explain our intentions towards her countrymen.

The governor being sufficiently recovered to venture in a boat, went to the place where Banalong and his wise lived—he found several natives on the spot, who told him that they were out a fishing, Araboo was in the boat, and her father being among them, a hatchet and some fish were given him, and he gave the governor a short spear in return; as the boat was pushing from the shore they perceived four canoes paddling towards them, in the foremost they perceived Banalong; the boat then lay too on her banalong had fecured his, he approached the boat, solding up his hands to shew he was unarmed.

Upon which the party landed from the boat, and he very readily joined them; he asked the governor where he was wounded, and faid that he had quarrelled with and beat the man who had wounded himbeing told that he would be killed if he was caught, he feemed no ways concerned, but defired it might be done-feveral prefents were made him, and he wanted some also for his wife; but being told that if she wanted them she must come and setch them herself-in about half an hour she made her appearance; fhe was called Barangaroo and appeared older than him; a petticoat and feveral little prefents were given to the lady, and a red jacket with a filver epau. let, which Banalong used to wear when at the settle, ment, were given him, which delighted him exceedingly; he was asked if he would come and dine with the governor the next day, to which he readily affent. ed, and faid that he would bring his wife and some friends with him.

Notwithstanding Banalong did not visit the governor according to his promise, he frequently joined the different parties he fell in with, although they were well armed, and would without the least tear go to the long boat, though he always saw musquets in her: his wise was generally with him in the canoe, and he intimated that he still intended paying the governor a visit, but his suspicion of being detained apparently had not been entirely done away; however the governor did not choose to take him a second time time by force; as he still entertained hopes that he would be soon reconciled to pass some of his time at Sydney, when he could be affured of being his own master, to go and come when he pleased.

At length his excellency's wifnes were accomplished; as he was going to Paramatta, a native was feen standing on one of the points of land, and as they rowed past him he was asked where Banalong was, when he pointed to an island called Memill, to which they rowed; as they drew near the rocks he came down to the boat accompanied by his wife, without the least figns of fear or distrust. They greedily took fome bread that was given them, and the boat foon after pushed off and left them; from the confidence now evinced by this man, there was little doubt but he would shortly trust himself at Sydney. Accordingly a few days after, as the governor was paffing in his boat, Banalang called to him repeatedly from the opposite shore where he was with some of the officers; and the furgeon, in whom he placed great confidence, persuaded him to go over to the governor; he took three natives with him, who were exceedingly pleased with the presents made them. It seems that Banalong's wife opposed his coming, and finding her tears and entreaties of no avail, flew into a violent passion, and broke a very fine fish-gig of her husband's for which she would have received a hearty drubbing had it not been for the interference of the Surgeon, who took them back to their refidence on the North flaore.

Banalong

Banalong appeared quite at his eafe and not under the least apprehension of being detained; he promised when he went away to bring his wife over, which he did two days afterward, accompanied by her fifter and two other natives; they were followed by a third-Blankets and cloathing were given them and each as much fish as they could eat. Banalong dined with the governor, and drank his wine and coffee as formerly-his excellency bought a spear of one of them, and gave them to understand, that fpears, lines, birds, or any thing they brought fhould always be purchased; and at the same time promised him a shield, for which he was to bring a spear in return-The next day a large party came over for the shield, but it was not finished; two of these men were owned by Araboo, as her brothers, and for whom the procured two hatchets, the most defirable present that can be given them-Banalong came the next day for his prefent; feveral of his comrades who accompanied him went away in a fhort time, but he staid to dinner, and left Sydney Cove, highly delighted with his shield, which being made of a good fubstantial hide and covered with tin, was likely to refift the stroke of a spear. It being late in the afternoon before he thought of returning, his. wife and fifter, with two men come over in their canoes to fetch him.

The girl who had been near eighteen months in the colony with the clergyman's wife, was so impatient to get away that at last it was consented to; and the very next day after she had less the settlement she was seen in the canoe naked, however she put on her petticoat before she joined the clergyman and some others who went to visit her: she appeared much pleased with her liberty, and the boy Nanbara, who was of the party, wished to stay with the natives all night; he was accordingly less behind, but the next morning returned to the settlement, and having fared but indifferently did not seem inclined to repeat his visit:

The natives now visited the colony daily; one morning Banalong came very early and breakfasted with the governor, and on taking his leave told him he was going a great way off, but should return in three days with two young men who were with him; and it was conjectured that they were going to fight with some other tribe.

When Banalong returned from his expedition, he immediately waited on the governor, with whom he dined according to custom: after dinner he related the cause of his absence; that he had been to fight a man who had formerly wounded him; he said his shield was a good one, and that his spear had pierced the shield and arm of his antagonist; he also said that the people he had been to fight with had killed one of the convicts, who had been some time missing.

Governor Philip conjectured that the women were not treated with the greatest deserence, in which conjecture conjecture he was certainly not much mistakent for Banalong frequently beat his wife with great few verity, although he professed great affection for her. He was often told that it was wrong and unmanly to beat a woman; but he only laughed at these remonstrances, and continued daily to visit the settlement, with his wife, children, and half a dozen of his friends: Coalby was generally one of the party.

Banalong, with his wife and children, now lived in a hut which the governor had built for them on the eastern point of the cove; they constantly had a number of visitors many of whom came daily to the fettlement; and all of them becoming very fond of bread, which they got in exchange for any triffling articles they brought, they foon found the advantage of coming amongst the settlers.

It had hitherto been the opinion that the custom of losing the front teeth was confined to the men, but a woman was also seen with the same mark, and two of them had the bottom of the griftle which parts the nostrils perforated; one of them was Barangaroo, the wife of Banalong, who never confidered herself dressed but when her nose was dilated with a small stick, thrust through the septum or griftle of the nostrils. She is very strait and well formed, her features well proportioned and pleasing, and, though she goes entirely naked, there is such an air of innocence about her that cloathing scarce seems necessary.

Araboo, the native girl, returned to the colony, after a few weeks absence, with some officers who had been

been down the harbour, and feemed perfectly happy in the opportunity of getting from the party she had been with. She said that she had lived three days with the young man she wished to marry, but that he had another wife, who was jealous of her, and had beat her; indeed evident marks of ill usage appeared about her head, which was so much hurt that she was put under the surgeon's hands. Her favorite, it seems, had taken her part, and beat his wife in return; but matrimonial squabbles, which are always settled by the exercise of the cudgel, are very frequent, and the women in general treated very roughly,

Sixteen of the natives paid a vifit to the governor one morning, and were regaled with fifth for breakfast, to which they fat down in the yard in the utmost good humour: those who had not been there before were highly delighted with the novelties that furrounded them. Banalong, who had been abjent for fome days, was of this party, and brought his wife with him; she appeared very ill, and had a fresh wound on her head, which he gave the governor to understand was because The had behaved ill, and in her ill humour had broken a fish-gig and a throwing flick. The governor again reasoned with him on the subject of beating his wife, but to no effect; he faid the was wicked, and therefore he had beaten her. When they had finished their breakfasts, his wife and another woman, a stranger, who had also been wounded by some of the men, went to the furgeon to have their heads dreffed; when they returned, Banalong miffing the governor, enquired for him, and faid that he wanted to fee him; upon which he was taken to his excellency, who was writing. Banalong feated himfelf, and appeared very much out of humour, frequently faying that he was going to beat a woman with a hatchet, which he held in his hand; it was impossible to divert him from his purpose, and, after some conversation, he was going to take his leave, excusing himself from dining with his excellency, as he was going to beat the woman; upon which the governor insisted on accompanying him; he made no objection to the proposal, though he was told that he would not be permitted to beat the woman. They set off for the hut, the governor ordering a serjeant and a couple of marines to attend him, and the judge advocate coming in at the time, went with them,

Though Banalong had faid he would kill the woman when they were endeavouring to perfuade him not to beat her, it was not supposed that he harboured any such intention, nor was it thought there would be much trouble to prevent his beating her; but lest he should in his passion strike her with the hatchet, which might be fatal to her, it was taken from him before they got to the hut, and, as he appeared reluctantly to part with it, the governor gave him his cane; but his menaces and countenance made them believe even that too dangerous a weapon to trust him with, and it was accordingly taken from him.

When they came to the hut they found several men, women, and children assembled; and notwith-standing governor Philip endeavoured to single out the object of Banalong's displeasure, whom he was determined on protecting, the surious savage seized a wooden sword, and darted on his victim, a sine girl of about about fifteen, who, on feeing him coming had hid her face in the grafs; he ftruck her feveral blows on the head before the weapon could be wrested from him; he then seized a hatchet, but was prevented doing any farther mischief.

The fury which took possession of him when he found himself prevented from beating the girl is indescribeable; the poor creature lay trembling in the grass, not daring to stir, and in momenary expectation of being put to death: he had got another sword, and was preparing to repeat his violence, but was laid hold hold of by the judge-advocate and the serjeant. The fracas being observed by the officers on board the Supply, they instantly went on shore armed, and took the poor girl, without any opposition from the natives, who had all armed themselves the moment they saw the governor and his party interfere.

When the boat had taken the girl on board the Supply, the party returned to the governor's house, where they were joined by several of the natives; Banalong was of the number: after some time his passion subsided, and he grew calm. He was then given to understand that the governor was very angry with him for endeavouring to kill a woman; that it was a cowardly and unmanly action, and should it be known that he did kill her, or even beat her any more, he should be put to death himself; but threats had no greater effect on him than entreaties, and he complained bitterly of the injury done him by depriving him of his victim; saying, that she was his, that her sather had wounded him over the eye, that she was of a wicked a wicked tribe, and that they should see he would kill her. When he was talked to by the judge advocate, and told that if he killed the girl the governor would kill him, he pointed with his fore-singer to the parts of the head, breast, and arms, where he said he would wound her before he cut her head off; in this resolution he returned home, and the girl was brought from the Supply to the governor's, accompanied by a young man whom Banalong had desired to remain with her. The attention paid her by this young native made every body conclude he was her husband, though he had not been seen to murmur or express any signs of disatisfaction when her life was in danger.

Two days after Banalong returned to Sydney, apparently in great good humour; he faid he would not beat the girl any more, but that he had been obliged again to chastise his wife, and had wounded her on the head, and that he had received a wound on the shoulder from a club in return. On being told to go to the hospital to have it dreffed, as well as his wife's head, he refused, faying, that the furgeon would kill him, and that he was afraid of fleeping in his hut, left he should shoot him in the night: though, to shew he was not afraid of meeting him openly, he went once or twice into the room where he had left his spear, brought it, and shook it by way of defiance. Governor Philip affured him that no harm was intended him, unless he killed the girl, or threw spears at the English. As soon as he was satisfied that the surgeon was still his friend, he agreed to go to him for a plaister for his shoulder; but his excellency, desirous of being prefent at their meeting, fent for Mr. White; Banalong received him as ufual, giving him part of what he was eating, and went with him to the hospital; after which he went to his house, and the girl being there against whom he had lately been so incensed, he took her by the hand, and spoke to her in a friendly manner. Barangaroo, who was present, was so exasperated at her husband's attention to the girl, that it was with great difficulty she could be prevented from doing her a mischief with a club she had snatched from one of the by-standers; nor did Banalong seem disposed to prevent her, till desired by Mr. White, when he gave her a sound slap on the face: she not being able to vent her passion on the girl, burst into tears, and went so the governor's; the girl was taken there for greater security, and was followed by several men.

Governor Philip ordered her to be put in a room occupied by one of his maid fervants, at which Banalong feemed greatly pleafed, and begged him to let the fame young man fray with her; in the mean time his wife grew quite outrageous, and used many threats; the had got her husband's spears, which she would not part with, till forced from her by one of the foldiers, from whom Banalong wanted to take them, faying he would give them to the governor himself; upon which they were delivered to him, and he immediately gave them as he promifed, begging that they might be lodged in the house: this shewed he placed fome confidence in governor Philip, notwithflanding he was very violent against those who prevented him entering the house, and threatened to knock them down with his club, though a file of foldiers was drawn up in the yard, and he knew that they had orders to fire on the least violence being offered. One of the natives, who was generally his companion, feemed ready to fupThey were all turned out of the yard except Banalong—Barangaroo was also turned out with the rest—but he staid dinner, and behaved with as much indifference as if nothing had happened. In the evening, when they were going, an unexpected scene took place; the native who had remained with the girl would stay no longer, and the girl forced her way out of the room to go with Banalong; she was brought back, and told she would be beat if she went with him; but he said he would beat her no more, and begged she might be permitted to accompany him: that Barangaroo would be reconciled to her, as her paffon was over, and she was now very good.

The governor was fully perfuaded that Banalong would keep his word, but the general opinion was against him, and that the girl would be facrificed; but the next morning he returned to dinner, and said he had sent her to her friends, which was afterwards confirmed. How he got this girl into his possession could never be learnt; she appeared about fifteen, and when she went away her wounds were in a fair way of doing well; fortunately for her the weapon Banalong first caught hold of was a boy's wooden sword, and made of very light wood; but they pay little attention to wounds, and even those which have been deemed dangerous by the surgeons, do not seem to require the common attention of closing and keeping them clean; which shews that they must be of an excellent habit of body.

CHORTLY after, the governor having occasion to Visit Paramatta, Banalong said he would accompany him; accordingly they fet out, and stopped at the point, in order to take his wife into the boat, but the refused, and also persuaded him to change his mind. On his excellency's return to Sydney, he was told that this party had been lamenting the lofs of a brother, who had been killed by one of the Camaragals; the women cried violently, but their grief was of no long duration; and Banalong went away with the officers, who, hearing the cries of women, had gone to the hut to learn the cause. As they proceeded down the harbour, looking after a fmall boat that had been lost with five convicts, he begged them to land him on the north shore, in order, it was supposed, to collect his friends, to go and revenge his brother's death. They found the wreck of the boat, and one of the bodies: and being feen under fail when it blew a gale of N wind wind, it was supposed that the people were ignorant of the management of her, and she had been driven ashore among the rocks. The natives were very alert in faving the oars and other articles that were driven ashore, and Coalby exerted himself greatly on the occasion, and saved the seine which was entangled among the rocks, for which he was rewarded with some cloaths, and a couple of blankets; the rest of them had also some small present; but let you cloath these people ever so well, they generally return naked the next day; for of all the things that had been given to Banalong, very little remained in his possession; he had, he said, sent his shield, and most of his cloaths, a long way off; but whether he had given them away, sold, or lost them, was equally uncertain.

The governor had built a small house at Paramatta, (the one I now occupy) and was going to remain there fome time, when feveral of the natives were defirous of accompanying him, among whom were Banalong and Coalby. His excellency took three of them in his boat; but Banalong going to fetch his cloak, was detained by his wife; but as they were going out of the cove he appeared on the rocks, and got into the boat, in spite of her threats and entreaties. No fooner was the boat put off, than she went to her canoe, which was a new one, and flove it, and breaking the paddles, threw them into the water; fhe then went to the but, probably with the intent of committing more mischief. Banalong endeavoured to pacify her, telling her he would not be more than one day absent; but all would not do, and he was put on The party then proceeded to Rofe-Hill, with Coalby and two other natives, none of whom ever opened their lips during the altercation; indeed they are never known to interfere in any dispute which does not immediately concern themselves.

The natives flept that night at Paramatta, and though they wanted for nothing, yet the next morning were very anxious of returning; a boat was accordingly fent down with them, by the return of which it was generally expected that news would be received of Mrs. Barangaroo's being again under the hands of the furgeon for her freaks; but, to the furprize of every body, the next day they both made their appearance, and it seemed that he had not beaten her: whether he had withheld the usual correction from what had heen formerly faid to him by the governor, or from fome other cause, could not be discovered; however a reconciliation had taken place, and they both dined with his excellency, in great good humour. Every thing they defired was given them; but no fooner was the dinner ended than the lady wished to return, and Banalong faid she would cry if they detained her, so that they were obliged to fend a boat down in the evening with them.

On the return of the governor to Sydney, he learnt that his gamekeeper had been dangerously wounded by the natives with a spear. It appeared that he went out with three others, one of whom was a serjeant, and in the heat of the day they retired to a hut they had made with boughs, and laid down to sleep. One of them waking, heard a noise in the bushes which he supposed to be some animal; but, on waking his comrades, and coming out of the hut, sour natives started up from among the bushes, and ran away with all their speed; the gamekeeper, thinking he knew one of them, who had been at Sydney, sollowed them without his gun, notwithstanding positive orders had been given for no one to trust himself with the natives unarmed, calling on them to flop, and he would give them fome bread; and observing one who followed him to have a gun in his hand, defired him to lay it down, as it only frightened the natives, and they would do them no harm: he had now advanced about fifty yards before his companions, and was not ten paces from one of the natives, who stopped short, and finding they were unarmed, fixed his spear on the throwing-stick in a moment, and threw it at the man nearest him; it entered his left fide, and penetrated the lower lobe of the lungs: it was barbed, and confequently could not be extracted till a a supperation took place. Immediately after throwing the spear, the native fled into the woods, and was feen no more. I have green in versions and fair b

They were eleven miles from Sydney when this accident happened, and it was with the greatest difficulty that the wounded man could be brought to the settlement. Being questioned whether he had provoked the natives to this violence, he defired to have the clergyman fent for, to whom he confessed he had been a very bad man; but at the same time declared that he had never killed or wounded any native, except once; when having had a fpear thrown at him, he discharged his piece, loaded with fmall shot, and wounded the man that threw the fpear; this declaration added to the testimony of those who were with him, left no room to doubt but that the native had the taken advantage of his being unarmed. Banalong and Araboo repeatedly faid that it was the tribes which lived about Botany Bay who threw the spears, and killed the white men, yet as it was evident that they generally received some provocation from our people, the governor was loth to proceed to extremities whilft there was any possibility of avoiding it; especially as he had been at so much trouble in bringing them to repose some considence in him; and a good understanding with them was essentially necessary to the happiness and prosperity of the colony.

Many of the natives now daily vifited the fettlement and were all well received; it was no unufual thing for the mothers to leave their children behind them for feveral days, without ever enquiring after them; and if any of them were going where the children' would be an incumbrance they made no fcruple of leaving them at Sydney; Banalong Coalby and two or three others took up their quarters there four days in a week, and all joined in the fame flory, and defired those natives might be killed who threw the fpears; but governor Philip had his fufpicions that there was a great deal of art and cunning in Banalong; he had lately been feen among those people he now wished to be killed, where he faid they danced, and that one of them had fung a fong in praise of his house, the governor and the white men at Sydney; and he faid those people would throw no more spears, as they were now all friends; this was but a few days after he was fo folicitous with the governor to kill them all.

What was rather extraordinary they all knew the man that threw the spear; they faid his name was Pemulaway, of the Bejigal tribe; Banalong and Coalby faid they would bring him to the governor; and went off the next day, as it was supposed to Botany Bay; and his excellency, upon a report that a number of natives had been feen armed about the mouth of the harbour, went down to the look-out; he met Coalby there, who returned to Sydney with him, but did not feem inclined to give himself any trouble about Pemulaway, but after dinner took his leave, faving he was going to Botany Bay to meet his wife. Banalong was ablent feveral days; they faid he was gone to affift at the ceremony of drawing a front tooth from fome young men, among the Camaragals, which gave rife to the idea that the tooth is extracted as a kind of tribute.

Araboo, now refided with the Camaragals; when the left the clergyman's the promifed to return with her fweetheart, and his wife; hence it appears evident that when they can procure two wives, the cuftom of the country does not prohibit their having them; though this cuftom feems very unreasonable, as the women bear no proportion to the men in point of number. It is generally believed that most of their wives are taken by force, or furprize, from the tribes with which they are at variance; confequently, their enemies retaliate, and from the disproportion of the females to the males must have been more successful in their Sabinical expeditions.

Spears being frequently thrown at the fettlers; it became absolutely necessary that a stop should be put to it, though his excellency wished to do it with as little feverity as poslible, yet he was convinced that a fevere example must be made to have the defired effect. Accordingly a party was fent out confishing of fifty privates, befides officers; they were directed to proceed to the fpot where the man was wounded; and to fearch for the natives who dwelt thereabouts, fome of whom were to be fecured and brought prifoners; or if it was found impracticable to take them alive; they were to put half a dozen of them to death-Spears, and all other weapons, which they happened to meet with were ordered to be destroyed and left on the spot, that they might see it was intended as a punishment inflicted on them-Particular attention was to be paid to the women and children, who where not to be molested on any account whatever; and as the governor wished to impress the idea that no deceit was ever practifed, and that they might depend on having protection whenever it was offered; he ordered that none of the party should hold up their hands, which is the fignal of friendship; nor to answer such signal if made them by the natives; they having lately behaved with great infolence on feveral occasions; and a punishment inflicted on a few, might in the end be an act of mercy to many.

Notwithstanding the most vigilant endeavours, the party was not able to get near any of them, as they made off at their approach, and eluded the pursuit, pursuit. They saw Coalby near Botany Bay, where he was fishing, at whom they fired several shot. They returned to Sydney without any success; but the governor being determined if possible to make an example of some of them, again sent the party with the same orders they had before received—They lest Sydney towards evening with the hope of surprising some of the natives at their sires, but were disappointed, not a single native being seen during all the time they were out.

It was near a fortnight before Banalong made his appearance, when he brought his wife with him; he faid he had been with the Camaragals, that feveral young men had undergone the operations of having their front teeth drawn, and Tattowing, which is making those scars which are considered as ornamental by the natives-Thefe fcars are made by cutting two lines through the fkin parallel to each other, with a fharp shell or flint, and then stripping off the intermediate fkin; the operation is repeated till the wound rifes confiderable above the furrounding flesh, when it is suffered to heal over. These painful embellishments are not very common among the women; Banalong shewed a throwing stick which had been cut for the purpose of knocking out the front teeth; and it was generally supposed he had been employed in that office. He was on good terms with the Camaragals, and he faid they were all good people; when he was afked if he had feen the man who threw the fpear at the governor, he faid yes, and had flept in the fame cove with him; fo that his former account of having quarrelled with, and beat him, was not believed. Barangaroo, who had been been with him on this occasion, was painted in a different manner from what the had been before, and there appeared to have been a great deal of attention bestowed on her; her cheeks, nose, and upper lip, were rubbed over with red ochre, on which, and under the eyes, were laid spots of white clay; the small of her back was likewise rubbed with ochre, and by her deportment feemed defirous of shewing that she was finer than common. Shortly after, two of the convicts being fishing, Banalong, finding they had no arms in the boat, went alongfide in his canoe, and robbed them of the fifth they had taken: his wife and fifter being in the canoe, and having feveral spears, the convicts were deterred from making any refistance. In consequence of this robbery, orders were given that no boat in future should go out of the cove unarmed.

The next time the natives came to the fettlement, they were told, that if any more spears were thrown they would all be killed; but thefe threats did not feem to make the smallest impression on them. Banalong coming soon after, he was charged with taking the fish from the two white men; he denied the charge with great affurance, afferting that he was a great diffance from the place at the time; but when the people were confronted with him, he endeavoured to justify himself, but with so insolent an air, that he rather aggravated than excused the offence : he frequently mentioned the man who had been wounded, and threatened revenge; but on recollecting himself he offered his hand to the governor, which being refused, he grew violent, and feemed inclined to make use of his stick; a centinel was called in, as it was feared he might commit some extravagance that would oblige his excellency to order order him to be put to death; for his behaviour was favage and infolent in the extreme, and would have met with inftant punishment in any other person; but they wished to bring him to reason, without having recourse to violent measures; and the governor was very unwilling to destroy that considence he had been at so much pains to create in Banalong, which the slightest punishment would have done: he was therefore desired to come near the governor, but he resuled, turned upon his heel, and went away. As he passed the wheelwright's shop, the workmen being at dinner, he stole a hatchet, with which, he got clear off.

venging the death of a man who had been shot. Governor Philip appeared to believe him, and he was suffered to go into the yard, which was always open to the natives; some bread and sish were given him, but he was not permitted to enter the house as usual: though this degradation did not a little hurt his pride, he frequently repeated his visits.

Governor Philip had been very defirous of fearning the reason that the females had two of the joints of the little finger cut off, and of feeing in what manner that operation was performed; he had now an opportunity of gratifying a part of his wish: Coalby's wife coming to the fettlement with a new born female, brought her infant to the governor's house; and being told that his excellency would be prefent at the operation, it was accordingly performed. A ligature was applied round the little finger at the fecond joint; but two days afterwards they brought the child again, the ligature was either broken or taken off; this being told the mother, the took fome hairs from the head of an officer who was prefent, and bound them very tight round the finger; after some time a gangrene took place; and though the child feemed uneafy when it was touched, it did not cry, nor was any attention paid to it after the ligature was applied. This operation had always been performed on the left hand, but this child was an exception, for it was the little finger of the right hand which underwent the operation: this bandage was continued until the finger was ready to drop off, when its parents took it to the furgeon, who, at their request, feparated it with a knife.

Banalong, after an absence of three weeks, during which time he had been particularly active in rendering services to a boat's crew, several of whom would have been lost but for his exertions, which were considered as a full atonement for his past behaviour, and he was admitted again into the favour of the governor. In consequence of this reconciliation the number of visitors increased, and the governor's yard became their head quarters.

Their medical operations partake more of the juggling than the Esculapian system. Coalby had formerly been wounded with a fish-gig below the lest breast, and though it must have been done many years, as it was extremely difficult to perceive the scar; yet it was supposed that he selt some pain from the straps of a knapsack, which he carried when out on an excursion with the governor: he had travelled two or three days with it on his shoulders, and the straps pressing against his breast, he complained of pain there.

He applied to an old man and his fon, who had joined them in the excursion, for relief, and they prepared to perform the cure: the son began the ceremony, by taking a mouthful of water, which he spirted on the part affected, and then applying his mouth, began to suck as long as he could without taking breath, which appeared to make him sick, and when he rose up (for his patient was extended at full length on the grass) he walked about for some minutes; he then repeated the suction three times, and he appeared, by drawing in his stomach, to feel the same pain he pretended to extract from the breast of his patient; and having picked up a bit of stick or stone, but with so little sleight of hand that it was obvious to the whole party, he pretended to throw fomething which he had taken out of his mouth into the water. He undoubtedly threw fomething away, which must have been what he picked up; but Coalby, after the cereinony was over, faid it was what he had fucked out of his breaft; which was understood to be two barbs of a fish-gig, as he made use of the word Buller dooul; but the governor was of a different opinion, and thought he meant two pains. Before this business was finished, the doctor felt the patient's back below the shoulder, and seemed to apply his singers as if he twitched fomething out; after which he fat down by the patient, and put his right arm round his back; the old man, at the fame time, fat down on the other fide of the patient, with his face the contrary way, and clasped him round the breaft with his right arm; each of them held one of the patient's hands; they continued in this fituation feveral minutes, straining him very close, and thus ended the ceremony; when Coalby faid he was perfeelly well. He gave his worsted night-cap, and a share of his supper, as a fee to his doctors; and being asked if they were both of the faculty, he faid yes, and a little boy that was with them was a doctor too; from whence it was supposed that the power of healing is hereditary, and descended from father to son.

As the natives frequently caught more fish than they could immediately use, great pains had been taken to induce them to barter it with the settlers at Paramatta for bread, vegetables, &c. Several of them had carried on this traffic, and there was reason to hope that a tolerable fish market would soon be established: among those who brought their fish was a young man that had lived some months.

months with the governor, but had left the fettlement, from time to time, to go a fifthing: his canoe was a new one, and, being the first he had ever been master of, he was not a little proud of it, and accordingly valued it highly.

Strict orders had been given that their canoes should never be touched; and, indeed, the interest of the marines and convicts should have secured them from insult; the traffic and intercourse tending much to their comforts, the balance being greatly in their favour; but in a very short time this amity and good understanding was interrupted by fome villains, who had frove the canoe of the young man before mentioned. The moment he discovered the injury done him, he flew to the governor's in a violent rage, faid the white men had broke his canoe, and that he would kill them; he had his throwing-flick, and feveral fpears in his hand, and his hair, face, arms, and breaft were painted red, which is a fign of the most implacable anger. It was not till the governor affured him that he would kill those who had destroyed his canoe, that he would liften to any thing tending to divert him from his purpose of killing the white men; he promifed, at last, that he would leave it to the governor to punish them.

The offenders were foon discovered, and were severely flogged in the presence of Balderry; but he was far from being satisfied, till he was told that one of them had been hanged. During their examination he appeared very impatient, and said that it belonged to him to punish the injury he had received. About a month after, when it was thought he had been amply compensated by various presents which the governor had given him; by seeing the offenders offenders punished; and by supposing one of them had been hanged, yet he took the first opportunity of revenging himself, which plainly shews that these people do not readily forgive an injury. A convict who had strayed from the settlement, was met by two of the natives; and he had scarce passed them when he was wounded in the back with a spear, and before he could recover himself he received a fecond wound in the fide; however he got away; and as they did not attempt to ftop him to get his cloaths, or take any thing from him, there was no doubt but the destruction of the canoe was the cause of this attack; especially as the same evening several natives were feen round a fire, and being afked who it was that had wounded the white man, they immediately answered, "Balderry." It is not a little remarkable that these people always tell the names of those who have thrown spears at the colonists, or who have stole any thing from the fettlement, if they are asked, though they are conscious that you mean to punish them; it might be thought to proceed from a principle of adhering to truth, did they not destroy this opinion by invariably denying any thing they may be charged with, though you fee them commit the offence, and lay the blame on another who is not prefent; it is not only furprizing that they always discover the offenders, but this they do openly, without any fear or dread of the confequence.

The defruction of this canoe was a most unfortunate accident, as it prevented the natives from carrying their fish to Paramatta; and no canoe visited the settlement for some time after; and, besides, the governor wished to attach Balderry to himself, intending to take him to England when he returned. After absenting himself about a month

a month or five weeks, Balderry began to make enquiries of the various parties he met, whether Beanah, the governor, was still angry; he was answered in the affirmative, and told that he would be killed for wounding a white man; yet this did not deter him from coming into the cove in a canoe, and the governor, upon being made acquainted with his appearance, ordered a party of marlnes to go and fecure him. Banalong, who was present, feeing the foldiers go towards the point, gave him the alarm, and he got off. Governor Philip faw Banalong fpeaking to the young man in his canoe, and gave him to understand that Balderry should be killed; upon which he called out that the governor was ft.ll very angry: on hearing this Balderry paddled off pretty brifkly to the opposite side of the harbour, and appeared to set their threats at defiance, and talked of spearing; but whether it was the governor or the foldiers that he threatened could not be diffinguished, he being at too great a distance to hear distinctly. These people are very resolute, and when provoked fet little value on their lives, fo they can be revenged; they ever contrive to be even with you, whether you praise or threaten, and whenever a blow is given they are fure to return it, though their lives should pay for it. A number of natives having arrived at Sydney, amongst whom there was upwards of thirty women and children; they were treated with bread and rice as usual: they informed his excellency that Balderry was on the opposite fide of the cove, with a party of his friends, armed. Whether his coming after what had paffed proceeded from a supposition that he should not be punished, or that he was fafe whilst surrounded by so many of his countrymen, it was thought necessary to order him to be taken, as foon as the vifitants should be gone; for as Balderry could was probable they would suppose themselves in danger, and make use of their spears in defence of their countryman, in which case many of them must have been killed; and this was the more likely, as many of the guests were strangers, and this was their first visit to the colony.

As foon as they had taken their leave, a party of foldiers were ordered after the delinquent, but before they got fight of him, he had been advertised of his danger by Nanbarre, who hearing what was going forward had left the place; a ferjeant and a party were fent after him: in their way they met feveral of the natives, who joined him in a friendly manner, but, while they were talking to the ferjeant, one of them had the audacity to attempt to wrest a firelock from one of the foldiers; however, he failed in the attempt, but immediately after a spear was thrown, fupposed to be by Balderry: two muskets were now fired among the natives, which wounded one of them in the leg, but, unfortunately, neither of the offenders. A ftrong party was immediately ordered to some brick fields, where a pretty numerous body of them had affembled; but Nanbarre, ever faithful to his countrymen, on feeing the foldiers form on the parade, took to the woods, and Aripping himfelf, that he might not be known, joined the natives, and put them on their guard; after which he returned, and faw the governor pass with some officers whilst he was hid in a bush; he afterwards met an officer's fervant, and asked where the governor and foldiers were going; on being told, he laughed, and faid they were too late for the people were all gone.

Lalus.

Banalong came in foon afterwards with his wife; and though he was told that the foldiers were gone out to take Balderry, yet the intelligence did not prevent him from eating a hearty dinner, and when he went away he left a large bundle of spears, fish-gigs, and various other articles, under the care of the governor. As the natives knew that the governor only meant to punish those who threw the spears, the late disagreements did not in the least interrupt their visits, and they called upon their friends with the same samiliarity as if nothing had happened. They were asked what became of the wounded man; they said he was gone to his tribe; that the wound was but of little consequence, and soon would be healed.

Barangaroo was now near her time of lying in, when the colonists had an opportunity of seeing their preparations on the occasion: she had two nets hanging from her neck, one of which, being new, the governor was defirous of obtaining, and it was given him, after she had taken a large piece of the Tea tree out of it, nicely folded up, and which was intended to lay her infant upon, and which is the only preparation previous to the ceremony of an infants' introduction into the world, that is made by lying in women in this country. The bark of the Tea tree is thick in proportion to to the fize of the trunk, and is composed of a great number of layers of very thin bark, not unlike in appearance to the Birch tree, but fo exquifitely foft, that nothing this country affords can be better calculated for the purpose for which it is intended. Banalong, however, defired to have a blanket for the child, which was given him, and next day a net made in the English manner, which was more acceptable to his wife than the one she had given the governor. Banalong informed informed the governor that his wife intended to do him the honour of lying-in at his house; this favour his excellency declined, telling him that the would be fo much better accommodated at the hospital, that he could not think of risking her health, by suffering her to be any where elfe, which compliment highly gratified both hufband and wife, and they accordingly took up their quarters there. Banalong had frequently folicited the governor to receive Balderry again into favour, but was always refused; however, on being told that the poor fellow was extremely ill, the furgeon was defired to go and fee him: he found him in a high fever, and the first question he asked was, whether the governor continued angry with him, and if he would let him go to the hospital to be cured. Banalong, who went with the furgeon, returned to the governor, who told him he was not angry now, and that he might bring his companion to the fettlement, he faid he would, and early the next morning. Balderry made his appearance: at first he was under great apprehensions, but on the governor's taking him by the hand, and promifing that when he was recovered he should live with him again, his fears fubfided: he appeared very ill, and went with the furgeon and Banalong to the hospital,

Religion of the natives—Their superstition—Preparations for a ball—Manner of dancing—Their method of fishing; of procuring fire—Their courtship.

If HAVE been thus minute in detailing the behaviour of the natives, and the perfevering diligence and inexhaustible patience of governor Philip, in conciliating and familiarizing them, in the infancy of the colony, that, thould they hereafter attain any degree of civilization, posterity may know to whom they are indebted for the extrication of numberless tribes from the rudest barbarism, thereby adding to society the inhabitants of a country which occupies a section of the globe of greater extent than all Europe, and capable of becoming a great and powerful empire.

With regard to religion, they fing an hymn, or fong of joy, from day-break till fun-rife; but we have not been yet able to discover whether they have any particular object to whom they pay adoration; neither do any of the celestial bodies feem to occupy more of their attention than any of the animals which inhabit this extensive country; yet they do not appear entirely ignorant of a suture state, as they say the bones of the dead are in the grave, and their bodies in the clouds; or may probably have been misunderstood, and mean that the soul is in the clouds. They most certainly burn their dead; for on opening a new made grave, a quantity of white ashes were found, which appeared to have been but lately deposited there; among the ashes were found part of a human jaw-bone, and a piece of a skull, which had not been sufficiently burnt to prevent its being perfectly afcertained. The grave was not a foot deep, but the earth was raifed as high round it as are the common graves in England, The fun, moon, and stars, they call were (bad). Araboo once went into fits on feeing a falling flar, and faid that every body would be deftroyed; although some who were present insisted that she particularly alluded to the "Murray nowey," the Sirius, which was lost some time after at Norfolk Island. From Banalong we understood that they believe in apparitions, which they call "Mane," he describes them as ascending from the earth with a horrid noise, seizing any one in its way by the throat: he fays these apparitions singe the hair and beards of those to whom they appear, which he faid was a very painful operation; rubbing the face after every application of the firebrand.

Their principal diversion is that of dancing, for which ceremony they prepare themselves with more than ordinary attention; they are all in their birth-day suits, like so many Adams and Eves, without even a sig least to parry the inquisitive glance of the curious European. The young women employ all their art in decorating the young men, who are chiesly ornamented with streaks of white, drawn with pipe clay, and in different forms, according to the taste of the man himself, or to the lady who adorns him. They are as emulous of appearing sine as the most similarly ball of his favourite mistress. Their paint cannot be applied without moistening, and the lady, in drawing the streaks down the face, which is the most effential part of the decoration, spits in the face of her friend whom she is adorn-

Their dances are always at the close of the day, as they prefer fire-light to that of the fun on these occasions.

The dance begins by a few young boys, and is encreafed by the men and women gradually falling in, to the number of thirty or forty, but mostly men: it is truly wild and favage, yet in many parts order and regularity are very apparent. One man would frequently fingle himself out from the rest, and running round the whole of the performers, fing out in a loud voice, some expreffion delivered in a peculiar tone of voice; he would then fall in with the rest of the dancers, who alternately led forward in the center, and there exhibit their utmost skill and dexterity in the most difficult contorsions of the body. which, in their opinion, constitute the principal beauties of dancing: one of the most striking is, that of placing their feet very wide apart, and, by an extraordinary exertion of the muscles of the thighs and legs, move their knees in a trembling and very aftonishing manner, such as no person in the colony could any ways imitate; of course much practice is required to arrive at any degree of perfection in this fingular motion. There is great variety in their dances; fometimes they dance in pairs, and frequently turn back to back, then fuddenly turn and face each other; fometimes they all fit on the ground, with their feet under them, in the manner of the Chinese, and at a particular word or fignal they are on their feet in a moment, which they perform without any affiltance fromtheir hands; they then run back in rows, and again advance in the fame order. Sometimes they form a circle with fome diffinguished person in the center; at other times all the dancers have green boughs in their hands:

in all the different figures they generally finish by a certain number of their principal dancers advancing to the front, and go through the difficult part of the dance, the quivering motion of the knees, upon which the whole company faces to the front, and go through the fame motions, the most expert being generally in the center-Their music consists of two sticks of very hard wood, one of which the mufician holds to his breaft in the manner of a violin, and firikes it with the other, in tolerable good time. The performers fing the whole time of the dance, affifted by feveral boys and girls who are feated at his feet, and by the manner of croffing their thighs form a hollow between them and their belly, upon which they beat time with the flat of the hand, which makes an odd though not disagreeable found. They are very prone to flattery, and if any strangers are present always ask for their approbation, and appear highly delighted if you fay " boojerie cariberie," a very good dance-which never fails to produce more than extraordinary exertions.

They are very dexterous in firthing fift: the spear of the gig with which they take them is about ten feet in length, but they can increase it by joints as we do our fishing rods in England; they have several prongs barbed with the bone of a fish, or of some animal. The fisher lies across the canoe, his face in the water, and his fish-gig ready for darting; thus he lies motionless, and by his face being beneath the surface, he can see the fish distinctly; in this manner they strike the fish with great certainty. The women are chiefly employed with lines and hooks; the lines manufactured from the bark of trees, the hooks commonly of the pearl of different shells: the talons of birds of prey they sometimes make use of, but the former are most esteemed. The women are frequently feen in a miferable canoe with two or three children, fishing the whole day, in the edge of a furf that would terrify an old feaman to trust himself near in a good stout boat. The men are excellent divers, and remain a furprizing time in the furfs where their canoes cannot live: whatever they bring up to the furface they throw on shore, where their comrade attends to receive it. ing fire ready kindled for cooking, they broil or roaft all their food; they have not the least conception of boiling, for one of the natives watching an opportunity when nobody was attending to the kettle, plunged his hand into the boiling water to take the fish; of courfe, to his utter aftonishment, he was terribly scalded. They procure fire with great labour, by fixing the pointed end of a round stick into a hole made in a flat piece of wood, and whirling it round fwiftly with both hands, fliding them up and down till the operator is fatigued, when he is relieved by fome of his companions; each takes his turn till the fire is produced: from the labour attending this process, it is no wonder that they are seldom seen without a piece of lighted wood in their hand. When they mean to evince a partiality to any stranger, they immediately affume his name, calling him by theirs; this they confider as the highest compliment they can pay an Englishman, and are highly pleased at being called by their new name. Of all their customs, that of making love would be the farthest from meeting the approbation of my fair countrywomen; that ceremony being, in this country, always prefaced by a found beating, which the lady receives, as a matter of courfe, with all the meekness imaginable.

Land in cultivation at Paramatta—Vicisfitudes of the weather—Mortality of the convicts—Investigation of their treatment on board the transports—Desertion of the convicts—Stock my farm yard—Governor Philip pleased with my superintendance—Lose myself in the woods—Interesting adventure—Conducted to Paramatta by a native boy—Visit my new acquaintance—Governor Philip departs for England.

XXX E had now upwards of a thousand acres of cleared land at Paramatta, three hundred and fifty of which were in wheat and maize; but though we had frequent showers of rain, yet not in sufficient quantities to compensate for the excessive drought which had been experienced in the preceding months; and from the ground being new, and requiring more work than was in the power of the fettlers to bestow on it, the grain in general had a very unpromising appearance. There are about two hundred acres laid out in gardens, as much more prepared for turnips and potatoes, and the remainder closed in for feeding cattle. We are very badly off for manure, and ere the colony can properly flourish it must be stocked with cattle, the ground being infinitely too poor of itfelf ever to produce crops fufficient for us to depend on it, folely, for fubfiftance. The fudden viciffitudes of the weather must also render our harvests very precarious, as well as prove injurious to the health of the new comers; it often happens that there is a change of from forty to fifty degrees twice in one day. It is no unfrequent quent circumstance to see the country strewed with numbers of birds, fallen from the trees, unable to fupport the intense heat of the meridian fun. Numbers of convicts fall victims, but it must not be wholly ascribed to the weather, as the debilitated state in which they are, for the most part, landed, would, were it a more favourable climate, be attended with a confiderable mortality; and they are generally fo weak that they cannot be put to any kind of labour, but are employed in weeding and pulling grafs for the purpose of thatching: we have frequently four or five hundred on the doctor's lift, who are individually vifited daily by the furgeon; upwards of fifty have died in a month, in the generality of whom nature appears entirely exhausted, and many of them were so fairly worn out, that they expired without a groan, and to all appearance did not experience the smallest degree of pain.

From a most humane suggestion of Captain Parker of the Gorgon, the governor issued orders for a regular survey to be taken of the condition of the convicts on their landing from the different transports; and a strict investigation taking place, it appeared that some of the captains had very much abridged their unsortunate passengers of the allowance stipulated by government for their subsistance; and this inhuman practice had been carried to such an extent in some of the ships, that it appeared many had been literally starved to death. A strong and pointed representation of the circumstance was sent home to government, which will, I hope, put an effectual stop to such pesarious proceedings.

Some

Some of the convicts had entertained an idea that they could range along the coast till they reached some of the Chinese settlements; subfishing themselves on oysters and other shell-fish, having been told that there was a copper coloured tribe one hundred and fifty miles to the northward, who were much more civilized than the natives they were with, and who trafficked with the Dutch from Timur, where they would be free. With these notions feveral parties fet off from Sydney Cove and Rofe Hill, but after some days straggling some were taken, and others returned of their own accord, induced by the imperative command of hunger; and as some were supposed to be still lurking in the woods, afraid of returning lest they should be punished for leaving the settlement, the governor, less inclined to punish than to convince them of their error, promited a general pardon to every one who should return within five days; at the same time declaring that an exemplary punishment would be inflicted on those who should be taken after that period. Accordingly feveral returned, and appeared fenfible of the lenity fhewn them, but some of them appeared capable of the most desperate attempts, and even talked of repelling force by force; they were however given to understand that no mercy would be shewn them on the least disposition to mutiny, and that any who were near those that might be fo disposed would be considered as principals, and treated accordingly. Almost all the deserters returned, and those who were still missing, was supposed to be murdered by the natives; and the miserable state of those that returned would, it was thought, most effectually prevent any more excursions of the like nature.

The purchases I had made at the Cape, as well as the prefents I brought from England, enabled me to furnish the officers and fettlers with various little articles, which in general were not to be had by the thins, fo that in a fhort time I had collected the following valuable stock for my farm yard: a fow in pig; two fine porkers; a young the goat and two kids; an English dunghill cock, three laying hens, and one with a brood of chickens and young ducks; thefe, with a young kangaroo, which I had been at infinite pains in rearing, three native dogs, myfelf, a convict woman fervant, and her fon Timothy, a youth between twelve and thirteen, a tractable and ufeful lad, comprifed the whole family. Having always had a firong predilection for horticulture, the garden employed great part of my time, and is now as prosperous and flourishing as any in the colony. Governor Philip, when he visits Rose-hill, takes great delight in it, and gives me much credit for its improvement, as well as for the appearance and spirit of industry manifest in the convicts under my fuperintendance.

Having contracted an intimacy with a young man who had taken one of the farms on the northern boundary, about four miles from Paramatta, I generally walked over once or twice a week; as I was returning from thence one afternoon, with no other company but my boy Tim, who, having evinced a great partiality for me, was now my conftant companion; a large male Kangaroo croffed the path just before us; I immediately took my gun from the boy, fired at the animal, and disabled one of his hind legs, which very much impeded his flight; however he preferved his distance for near an hour, when, getting getting a fair shot at him, I lodged a ball in the back part of his head, which effectually did his business.

Upon examining our prize, I found it would be imposfible for us to get it home without help; we therefore fearched for a place to conceal it till the next afternoon, when I meant to return for it with a couple of men: a few paces from where it lay we perceived a cavity on the flope of a deep ravine, to which we dragged the carcase, and covering it with stones and grass, began to think of making the best of our way to the settlement.

The fun was now fetting, and I began to be alarmed at being so far from home: in the eagerness of our pursuit I had forgot to take any bearings by my pocket compais, and the day clofing ere we had reached any known path, increased my apprehensions in the extreme. Poor Tim, though half dead with fatigue, endeavoured to keep up my fpirits, which he perceived were much agitated: "He was certain fure"-he faid-" that we were in the right road, and that we should get home time enough to muster the people at nine, the hour fixed for that purpose; and that if we were obliged to fleep in the woods, why, he would cut fome grass for my bed, and stand centinel with the gun while I lay down, for he was not afeard to fire: and befides, my dear mafter,"-added he-" you know the natives are fo 'feard of guns, that should they come I only need show it, and they'll be off like a shot." The boy's courage and fidelity charmed me; and put me to the blush to think I had so little command of myself as not to conceal my uneafiness from him.

After rambling for near two hours, we could not perceive that we were any nearer home than at funfet, but rather conjectured we had taken a different rout, as we did not recollect a fingle object that now prefented itfelf; it being a fine star-light night, we could distinguish the river at times through the trees at some distance; but presenting a different appearance to any part we had ever seen; we quickened our pace with the hope of speedily reaching its banks, when, to my great mortification, we were stopped by a deep ravine. I now abandoned all hopes of reaching the settlement; and, as the poor boy was almost exhausted with satigue, made up my mind to passing the night on the spot.

With this determination we began to cut grafs, and pull fome boughs, in order to make a fire; for although it had been intenfely hot in the middle of the day, I could now very well have difpenfed with a great coat. While I was thus employed, Tim, who had got fome distance from me, came running back, faying I might fave myfelf the trouble, for he had found a fnug fleeping place for us, with plenty of dried wood for a fire, I followed him to the fpot, and found it was a hut inhabited by the natives when hunting; as I had no apprehensions of their returning, the hunting feafon having just closed, I got a light from a flash of powder, and in a few minutes kindled a comfortable fire. In one corner of the hut was a bundle of grass ready dried which we spread to lie down on; but I could not prevail on the boy to think of fleep; no, if I would trust him with the gun he would keep watch. Not being inclined to fleep myfelf, I took a book from my pocket, and, by fire light, endeavoured to amuse my felf till day-break. I had scarce perused half a dozen pages, ere poor Tim had funk into a found fleep; how long it was before I followed his example, or how long I should have continued it, is difficult to determine, had I not been waked by an acute pain in one of my hands, which I found was occasioned by the bite of some ants, whom I had accidentally molested in my sleep: I called Tim, and fallied forth; following the winding of the ravine, about a mile, we arrived at its termination, and perceived a break in the high lands before us, through which I distinctly faw Rose-Hill, about fix or seven miles diftant; this prospect revived our spirits, which were beginning to flag, with the reflection that if we escaped every other danger that of being starved to death was inevitable, unlefs we could extricate ourselves from the labyrinth in which we were involved. Having, fet the foot by my compass, I found it bore W. S. W.; as we defeended to the plain we loft fight of the object, but continued our course in that direction till we arrived at a fwamp, which cost us some time in getting round, there being no possibility of crossing it: we had now got to a part almost impassable from the quantity of underwood, and the trees were fo close together that we could fcarce fee three yards before us, and were proceeding very flowly through a thicket, when we were alarmed by a deep groan, apparently but a few paces distant; a found so unlooked for, for some moments rivetted us to the spot. Not being immediately able to perceive from whence the groan iffued, I advanced with great caution about a dozen paces, when I discovered a cave in the side of a rock; I was at first for retreating, but on recollecting that perhaps I might render some service to the afflicted, and that I equally stood in need of affistance, or perhaps might perish with hunger, I examined the priming of my gun, forced Tim, with fome difficulty, behind me, and approaching the entrance of the cave, a most interesting scene presented itself to my view: a young creature feated on a jut of the rock, mournfully contemplating the extended body of a man, whose expiring groan had just pierced our ears; all her faculties were fo absorbed with grief that we were yet unnoticed: a fympathizing forrow pervaded all my frame; I gave my gun to Tim, and made figns for him to retire, lest the fight should alarm her; when she perceived me fhe uttered a faint shriek, and funk motionless on the body. Observing a small pond a few paces from the cave, I fent the boy to bring some water in his hat, and gently moved her from the body to the mouth of the cave, raifed her up, and supported her in my arms; the water soon brought her too, when she raised her head, and regarded me with a look blended with grief and terror; I endeavoured, by every fign I could fuggest, to do away her fears, and retired a few paces, leaving her at liberty to go from the cave had she chose. Gaining confidence by my behaviour, she made me understand that the deceased was her brother, who, faint with the lofs of blood, could not reach their habitation; and night approaching they had turned from the road to shelter themselves in this cave. On examining the body I found a deep wound under the left pap, made with a fpear, part of which, being barbed, remained in the wound: I made her understand, partly by figns, and partly by fome words I had picked up, that I had, unfortunately, lost my way, and had been all night in the woods: she shook her head, and pointed to her brother, fignifying that she could not leave him; but that their habitation was not far off, and making me obferve ferve a hill about two miles distant, gave me to underfland it was in their neighbourhood. I made signs to her, that if she would go and acquaint her friends with her situation, I would watch by her brother till her return: hereye glistened with joy as she gathered my meaning, and with an assenting inclination of the head, more eloquent and expressive of her feelings than in the power of the most refined language to convey, she quitted us with a celerity quickened by fraternal love, and in a few moments was out of sight.

This interesting and pathetic scene had so wholly abforbed all my faculties, that not a fingle reflection of danger had occurred to me in the approaching interview, when Tim, who had been witness to several instances of the perfidy of the natives towards the fettlers, strongly urged me to leave the body, and make the best of our way home. Roused by his folicitations, a momentary impulse of fear came over me, and my mind had half yielded to his importunity; when casting my eye on the body methought I perceived it heave; a feeble figh convinced me that life was yet unextinguished, and the imperative call of humanity decided my operations: a death-like dew had beforead his face and limbs, which I dried with my handkerchief, and chafed his body with my hand. Tim most readily bore his part in this act of humanity, and a returning warmth encouraged us to redouble our efforts; in a few moments we perceived a faint pulfation, which gradually increased: at this juncture we were surprizedby the return of his fifter, accompanied by her father, another elderly man, and a boy about twelve years of age; feeing us busied about the body, they stopped short at the entrance of the hut, feemingly at a loss for our conduct.

Lbeckoned

I beckoned my young friend, who advanced with the utmost confidence, and giving her the hand of her brother, she exclaimed, with great emotion, " Didgerrygoor, didgerry-goor," I thank you, I thank you ;-and turning to her father, called him to her: I immediately quitted my flation, and refigned him to their care; the old man examined the wound, and with great feeming skill extracted the barb. During the operation the youth lifted up his eyes, and observing his father, a glance of filial affection beamed forth. Hope now tranquilifed the boding fears of the little group; Yeariana, his fifter, fupported him while the father and his friend were contriving how they should remove him to their dwelling; finding it necessary to dispatch some one for their canoe, the river which passed their habitation winding within fifty paces of us, and which was the fafeft and only conveyance he could bear; Yeariana proposed going for it; and it being our direct road to Paramatta, I seized the opportunity of accompanying her; in less than an hour we arrived at the foot of a finall mountain, when Yeariana, like an arrow from a bow, abruptly quitted us: leaving her brother, the boy before mentioned, as our guide, we were not long before we discovered near a dozen natives, with Yeariana at their head, waiting our arrival; she had fent off the canoe for her brother, and had got some dried fish, which the prefented us, and led us to her nut or cave, which was a large excavated rock on the bank of a very pleafant branch of the river. The reception we met with from this grateful people almost bordered upon adoration; the mother of Yeariana was quite troublefome with her careffes for my fervices to her fon; and I could perceive in the mild eye of her daughter that it anxioufly fought a farther acquaintance. Upon enquiry I found

we were near five miles from Paramatta, but that none of them had ever visited the settlement; however, Batcherry, her brother, offered to be our conductor, provided I would take care of him, and see him part of the way back next day; promising to see her again shortly, I took my leave, and arrived at Paramatta about noon, heartily satigued, My absence had not caused any alarm at the settlement, as they thought I had gone to Sydney Cove, which I had done twice or thrice, and staid there all night.

Every object that prefented itself to Batcherry filled him with furprize and aftonishment, and the poor lad had scarce time to eat or drink, so much was he taken up with admiration of the wonders that furrounded him. The next morning I fet him on his way home, giving him a hatchet for himself, and a string of beads for his fifter, whose image had made a strong impression on my mind, being the most interesting I ever saw: with a form that might ferve as a perfect model for the most scrupulous statuary; her face and hair unlike any thing I had ever feen in this country; the first of a perfect oval, or Grecian shape, with features regularly beautiful, and as fine a pair of eyes as can be imagined; the latter long, and of a shining black; she was likewise of a much lighter colour than any of her countrywomen, and might eafily have been taken for a beautiful Oriental Creole.

Taking three men, and the boy Tim, we went in fearch of the fpot where we had concealed the Kangaroo, and with some difficulty found it; we cut a couple of stout sticks, and laying the animal across it, took spell and spell till we reached home, when I rewarded the men with a fore quarter for their trouble,

It was more than a week ere I could spare time to pay a visit to the abode of my charming Yeariana; when arranging my buliness so that, should I be detained all night, my absence would be of no material consequence, I took Tim with me, and with much more facility than I expected found my way to Paculbenah, the name of the place where the family of Yeariana relided; Batcherry faw us as we turned the foot of the mountain, and running back to the caye, gave notice of our coming; the whole family, except Palerino, who was not fufficiently recovered, were ranged at the entrance of their cave; their joy at feeing me was evident in their countenances; the old man took me by the hand, and led me to his fon, who was now out of danger; he expressed his thanks by a hearty fqueeze of the hand, and a look that amply explained his meaning; his fifter was not deficient in expressions of satisfaction, by every little attention in her power. Having brought plenty of beef, bread, and a little brandy with us, left we might stand in need of refreshment, we seated ourselves in a circle on the ground, and spread our fare on a piece of canvas which had contained it; every eye was fixed on me, and every motion gave fresh cause of wonder. There being no knives among them, I carved the meat for them all, and gave to every one a part; the beef they eat with great avidity, but did not relish the bread, and rinsed their mouths several times after it. When the meat was all eaten, they produced fome dried fish, roots, two or three kind of berries, and a nut refembling the Chefnut in tafte: every person having finished eating, Wanjarkoo, the father, clapping his hands thrice they all started upon their feet, and prepared to refume their usual avocations; the old man and his wife went to the canoe to finish their day's fifhing:

fishing; Batcherry to cut grass; and Yeariana was left to attend her brother, Palerino, who lay on a bed of dried grass in one corner of the hut; she, after some minutes paufe, took my hand, and drawing me towards Palerino, joined it with his, and whifpering fomething to him, he cried " Boodjerie, Boodjerie," Good, good, Palerino.and by figns asked my name, when I repeated "George," two or three times; then fqueezing my hand to his breast, he made me understand that he would change names with me, and I must call him George, and he would call me Palerino, and that he would come and bring Yeariana with him to the fettlement, as foon as he was well: this ceremony was finished by his fifter kissing us both, repeating " Boodjerie Palerino, Boodjerie George," Good Palerino, good George, - and appeared quite overjoyed. They now made me understand, that the day before I found them, as they had been out together, fearching for a kind of grub, which is a part of their food, they were surprized by two of the tribe of Wangal, their mortal enemies, one of whom her brother had killed with a fish-gig; during the conflict she had thrown a stone at the furvivor, which fo disabled him that he retreated with difficulty to his canoe, and rowed off with precipitation: Palerino, faint with the loss of blood, could not reach their habitation, and night approaching they had turned from the road to shelter themselves in the cave where I found them.

Highly pleased with my visit, I took leave an hour before sunset, when they repeated their assurances of coming to the settlement, which was what I ardently wished for, as I slattered myself that I should be able to persuade them to stay some time with us, and thereby cement that friendship which had just taken root, and might eventually prove beneficial to the settlement, as well as promote certain views just dawning on my mind with respect to Yeariana.

Mr. Wentworth, who refides at Norfolk Island, had been appointed to the fame station there that I occupy at Paramatta, which, joined to his skill in surgery, renders him an invaluable acquifition; and, as we frequently correspond, he has kindly promised me an account of the rife and progress of that settlement: he speaks with rapture of the urbanity of governor King to all ranks and descriptions, and whose unremitting attention to the clearing and cultivating the land, already enables the fettlers, of which there are between forty and fifty failors and marines, who have parcels of land allotted them of fixty acres each, and about twenty convicts, who have ten acres each, not only to support themselves, but to have fomething to spare: indeed, they have greatly the advantage of those settled at Sidney and Paramatta, the ground being much more fertile; the wheat frequently producing an increase of twenty fold, and it is conjectured that future harvests will be more productive. Potatoes thrive exceedingly, upwards of an hundred having been feen to a fingle root; and every kind of gardenvegetable shoots up in abundance, and in the greatest perfection.

To ascertain in what time a man might be able to cultivate ground sufficient to support himself, the governor, about a twelve-month ago, ordered an acre of ground to be cleared in a good situation; it was then given to avery decent steady convict, who was told, that if he was industrious.

industrious, in order to prove the experiment, he should have thirty acres given him, cleared in like manner. He was very assiduous, and, at the expiration of fix months, requested another acre to be cleared for him, which was granted; and he is now able to support himself, without drawing any assistance whatever from the public stores.

The declining health of our worthy governor rendering his return to England indispensable for its re-establishment, he made the necessary arrangements for the future government of the colony; and having persuaded Banalong and another native to accompany him, embarked on board the Atlantic transport, and, with the benedictions of every person in the settlement, proceeded on his voyage to England.
