led this initial stage of development. In this period the first two stages of differentiation had been completed, while the third was still in progress. The result was that the three forms of the language were now clearly differentiated, and each had its own specific characteristics.

The first stage of differentiation, which occurred between 1100 and 1200, was characterized by the appearance of a new form of speech, called "Middle English". This stage of differentiation was marked by the disappearance of Old English from the written language, and by the introduction of a new form of grammar and syntax. The second stage of differentiation, which occurred between 1200 and 1300, was characterized by the further development of Middle English, and by the appearance of a new form of literature, called "Chaucerian English". The third stage of differentiation, which occurred between 1300 and 1400, was characterized by the final disappearance of Old English from the written language, and by the complete establishment of Middle English as the standard literary language of England.
